crowns are lower this season and many of them are soft and made in sections.

For some reason black is always the most popular shade for millinery, especially for winter, and it doubtless will be this year again, but after black come the colors termed "wood" shades which are on the brown and tan tints. Spruce and mignonette green are two shades that one hears about, wherever millinery is to be sold. The orange shades are not new, but they are to be used again because they have become very popular as an accessory color, and so will red.

In writing of millinery, we must not overlook the smaller chapeau, for there are many who would as soon think of carrying a sunshade in mid-winter as wearing a large floppy brimmed hat, or even a more conventional one. For these, Fashion has provided a sort of Hindu turban made of Persian tinsel or some other suitable material laid in folds and plaited around the crown, with a sweep of burnt goose or peacock or some such feathery ornament dropping over the right ear. There is great variety in the new millinery and it would be difficult to enumerate all the interesting things, which we shall see before long in the millinery parlors and which will be shown at the fall openings. But we have enumerated a few of the principal features and now for a word or two about dresses, which are so like costumes that we shall want autumn to come early and linger long so we can wear them.

With the return of the longer skirt, we find the designers going back to the early Greek tendencies towards drapery, especially side drapery, and the soft, pliable materials which are to be worn this autumn, lend themselves admirably to this style of costume. Fashion articles of late have constantly mentioned the "blistered" cloths, and one naturally wonders what they are like. They are very much like the old crepons of twenty-five years ago, only of rather a nicer construction. One piece we have in mind is called "klo-ka," and has a raised design in silk on a fine wool background of basket weave. The design on this particular piece is Egyptian, but that has nothing to do with the nature of the goods. The mill that makes this cloth has a penchant for Oriental designs.

Large soft roll model in red velours. Silk stitch edged brim and there is flower ornament at side.

Duvelyn, broadcloth, Poiret twill and tricotine are all used for fall costumes, and are made in coat-dress style with the draping coming over to one side, and caught up just a little below the natural waist line with a jet or metallic cabochon, or, on some models, there is a jet girdle or belt made of cabochons. This sort of trimming is going to be very fashionable for fall, and on silks, crepe or faille, the girdle will be finished with a deep fringe, full length in some places, say in the front and short on the sides. Large cabochons used to catch up the drapery also have deep bead fringe.

There is oodles of bead trimmings on the afternoon dresses of crepe de Chine, Canton crepe and crepe Georgette, and just by way of long distance advice, let me give you a hint—white is the color elect—if it can be called a color—for evening wear, but it is too early to talk of frivolous frocks this month.

The waist line is still what we call the Moyenne, although Irene Castle, the flapper's ideal, says she is going to wear her belt where nature intended it should be worn because she doesn't like floppy, negligee styles for street or evening wear. Talking of waist lines, brings us close to the subject of corsets.

It has been alleged that the up-to-date woman has not been wearing corsets for the past year or two. Well, if she hasn't been, there must be a tremendous

A Canadian woman was protesting, the other day, about the lack of Canadian features in our newspapers. "Look at all the stuff we have in them—syndicate, I think it is called—which we get from the States. Who is Jane Doe? Someone in Chicago, I suppose. Then there's Thornton Burgess with his animal stuff. I'm sure our own Bertha Green, who writes for the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and other publications can give us articles just as good as any which we import. Can't we persuade Canadian editors to give us native material?"

"Would the native read it?" asked the Teacher cynically. "My experience is that all the cheap, poor stuff which comes to us from New York or Chicago, is what Canadians want. Look at those dreadful colored comics. I don't look at them, as a rule, for they're bad literature and worse art. You will hear Canadians referring every day to characters in the comic features as if they were familiar friends. Of course," added the Teacher caustically, "our newspapers are not literature. Our editors seem to copy all the inaccurate Americanisms 'Gotten' and 'proven,' which are poetic and archaic forms, quite picturesque in their place, are used by Canadian editors almost as freely as by those on the other side. In fact we read 'Chicagoese' every day. It is only when I go to the library and get the English papers that I can escape from that dreadful 'gotten.' The best New York and Boston papers are models, but unfortunately Canada does not imitate those."

"It is so much easier to imitate cheap stuff," I murmured in apology.

"You needn't blame the editors for buying all this Yankee syndicate stuff," said a National Council lady. "Canadians refuse to read their own writers unless they have been approved by the United States or England. How many of us buy a Canadian magazine of any kind once a month? Where do the magazines, which are sold by thousands of our news stands every month, come from? New York or Philadelphia. They are beautiful, of course, and I buy some of them myself. But I contrive to buy Canadian magazines, too, and find that it is worth while to keep up with my own country."

"After all, we are reading some of our own writers in the United States papers," said a member of the I.O.D.E. "There is the syndicate letter on health and our nerves and all that kind of thing. It is written by H. Addington Bruce, and Mr. Bruce is a Canadian, a son of Colonel Bruce of Toronto. I think the comic stuff is deplorably crude and vulgar, but our people ask for it, and who are editors that they should seek to elevate public taste? Some day, perhaps, we shall cease to be interested in vulgar children who spend their time playing practical jokes at the expense of their elders—especially the infirm. And, at a later day, we may find family quarrels in large capitals and shrieking colors quite dull and stupid. In the meantime, the editors supply what the public demands."

"There's another matter," said a social service worker. "An editor told me the other day that it is women who demand vulgarity and the exploiting of sordid details. Some years ago, there was a highly sensational trial in New York. This editor gave orders that there was to be only a curtailed report of the trial in his paper. Another journal in the same city (let's call it "The Rag") went fully into all the most disgusting details, and dwelt upon the case editorially almost every day. The editor of the decent paper said that many readers (all of them women) complained that they could not find enough about the trial in the columns of his paper:—while, at the same time, they declared the case to be 'simply shocking.' Did you notice that there were eleven women to one man during the hearing of the Delorme case in Montreal?"

"But the men were busy. They couldn't go," protested a young person.

"Why weren't the women too busy to go?" asked the member of the I.O.D.E. The truth of it is that if we women made our homes what they ought to be we should have no time to read about sordid crimes or to attend a court case. Poor cooking is the secret of much hard drinking."

"I don't believe in blaming everything on the women," said the young person.

"Neither do I," said the social service worker. "But it is too true that very few women know how to cook or how to make the best of a limited diet. There seems to be no way of educating the public in matters of taste, except by a slow process. Children who have been shown the best models in art and taught to appreciate good literature don't care for the poor stuff. It isn't by saying 'don't' that children's taste is formed. It is by the positive way of giving them the best. I know a widow—an Italian woman—who is far from rich—who has brought up her small boy—now fourteen—to care for good pictures and statuary. I wish you could hear the youngster sing. He has a glorious voice, and it is the opera, not jazz, which attracts him. You don't need to spend much time, telling children what to avoid, if you give them enough of the right stuff to do and to enjoy."

"That may be true," said the National Council lady. "But children are going to play with other children and want to read what the others are reading."

"The 'others' are not nearly as important as the mother, if she's a real chum," said she of the social service. "A youngster can have a wonderful time at the theatre and among the books, if he or she has only the right comrade in a mother who understands how to get the most fun out of the best things."

The young person said: "But what were we talking about? Syndicate articles from the United States in Canadian papers, I think. When we are anxious to have articles for our own benefit by our own writers, we'll make the editors get them; but, in the meantime, we must put up with Jane Doe and the rest of them. By the way, I wonder what's become of Ruth Cameron. She used to write nice little uplift articles, with a gentle pathos about them."

"There was another Ruth," said the member of the I.O.D.E. in reminiscent fashion. "Her name was Ruth Ashmore, if I remember correctly, and she wrote 'Side Talks with Girls' for a woman's magazine. There was a wicked comic paper which wrote a parody in 'Snide Talks with Girls' by Truth Mashmore. The parodies were much more interesting than the original articles."

"Well," said the young person. "I don't like some of the stuff which is addressed to girls, but I always read the Tower Room."

"So do we," said the rest of us, although much older than the enthusiastic speaker.

army of women who are not up-to-date in Canada or else the corsetieres are fibbers, for nearly every time we go into a corset department to have a friendly chat with the corsetiere, she is always so busy fitting corsets that we can hardly get a minute with her. The fact of the matter is, that women have been buying soft, negligee sort of models that are next to no corset at all so far as supporting the figure is concerned, and now when they are in danger of losing whatever symmetry of figure they possessed, are beginning to get alarmed and are flocking to the corset shops to be properly corseted once again, and never has there been a corset fashion that required careful fitting, such as the present low-topped model calls for, and to wear a skirt and waist with it is almost impossible, unless a good fitting brassiere is worn, and this is where the diaphragm control model comes in useful. It is cut deep enough to take in the top of the corset and has a reinforcement across the diaphragm which controls the flesh over the corset. It also has an elastic waist band and elastic inserts, which provide for waist adjustment.

If a ceiling light is used in entrance hall, the lantern type fixture is most effective with windows fashioned from glass or tinted parchment. A torchier or pedestal lamp is also effective for hall lighting and may be used appropriately on staircase landings. The base of the torchier may be of either wood or wrought iron with a lantern top, fashioned from colored glass.

Decorative lamps may be made from wired vases with fringed silk shades of contrasting colors. In this connection it may be pointed out that rose or yellow are the best colors through which to sift light. No matter what color combinations may be introduced to carry out the general decorative scheme, it is always safe to line lamp shades with either yellow or rose, preferably yellow.

1000 Children's Doctors Urge This Care of a Child's Skin

Recently we sent test packets of a new way of caring for a baby's skin to leading children's specialists throughout America.

In reply, we were amazed to receive over 1000 letters urging the care of a child's skin of even as great importance.

The vast majority of mothers, these doctors said, do not realize that children's skin is different from adults and must be cared for differently.

So now comes a scientific toiletry of childhood as part of a universal movement to assist mothers in protecting their children's skin from improper methods of cleansing.

Bauer & Black

Keeping her sweet and alluring, and guiding her to the radiance of clear skinned girlhood, is now but the detail of a few simple rules of care which any mother can follow

The simple new way of keeping a child's skin flawless which children's specialists are now advising

This is to explain a simple new way of caring for a child's skin, which more than 1000 of America's leading children's doctors endorse and are urging mothers to follow.

Also to offer, free, a liberal test of the two Bauer & Black nursery requisites it embodies—a cake of Bauer & Black Baby Soap and a sifter can of Bauer & Black Baby Talc, both in a charming miniature package. Simply mail the coupon below, and you will receive them by return mail.

Pretty at 6, but—at 16?

The answer is in every mother's hands.

Authorities now tell us that the charm of a radiant complexion in girlhood is dependent upon the care given the skin in childhood.

Yet many mothers do not realize that fact, and continue the indiscriminate use of ill-chosen soaps in the daily hygiene of the nursery.

Thus many a naturally beautiful complexion, that most envied possession of childhood and girlhood, is ruined before being given a chance to bloom.

But you can protect this appealing freshness, can keep the child's skin smooth and flawless, and lead to the radiant girl, or the clear skinned boy of your ideals, if you will.

Avoid the use of ordinary toilet soaps. Do not think that what is good for your skin is necessarily good for the children's.

Bauer & Black Baby Soap is made for infants and children. It is tempered to the delicate fineness of their skin. It embodies scientifically accepted elements, which the youthful skin must have to be healthy.

The New Treatment Children's Doctors Advise

First, rinse the skin with clear, lukewarm water. Then with a wash cloth (one not used by others of the family) work up a gentle lather with Bauer & Black Baby Soap. Cleanse the skin with light circular movements; do not rub up and down, do not rub hard. Then rinse thoroughly with lukewarm water. Then dip the cloth in cold water and "pat" it over the face. Dry with a soft, clean towel, avoiding harsh rubbing.

Then at Night, Do This

Follow the foregoing treatment, but after drying the skin, lightly powder the face with Bauer & Black Baby Talc.

This is recommended because Bauer & Black Baby Talc contains highly curative and soothing ingredients most necessary to protect the skin from rash and irritations. It is in no sense of the word an ordinary "talc" but a scientific agent of protection, designed for this purpose, and now employed by many of the most prominent children's specialists in America. A new preparation, embodying newly discovered principles of skin hygiene.

Note Results in One Week

Results from this method are quick—and amazing. In one week a marked improvement, both in skin texture and in color, is noted. Continued observance results in the refreshing sweetness of the naturally flawless skin of a healthy child.

The Test is Free

We urge all mothers to make the test. It is free. Simply mail the coupon.

The Reposeful Bedroom

WHEN at all feasible, a bedroom should be planned with some regard for its future occupants and their tastes. For instance, the modern boy is inclined to use his bedroom as a den; a cosy and attractive place in which to study, to experiment with radio or even indulge in athletic stunts—in short, as a veritable club for the boy and his young associates. A book-case, a well-lighted desk and some strong, comfortable lounging-chairs have, then, a logical place in a boy's bedroom. This is likewise true of a young girl's room, as a provision for any informal entertaining that may be done by the youthful occupant. The average girl is also apt to lay particular stress upon ample wardrobe space and adequate dressing conveniences.

As a rule, the bedrooms intended for the use of the older members of a household can be planned more distinctively as sleeping-rooms. If space and other conditions permit, it is, however, advisable to so plan these rooms, that such furniture as a desk, a chaise-lounge or, perhaps, a great, chintz-covered fireside-chair can be eventually added without undue crowding of the more essential pieces.

The number and the character of the guest-rooms must be determined by the is dependent in a large measure upon the right use of color; upon the avoidance of distracting patterns and upon the absence of useless furniture and fittings. Uncrowded wall-spaces and stretches of unoccupied floor, in promoting spaciousness of effect, also tend to confer reposefulness.

Desirable as the sense of repose may be, it is not at all necessary to entirely denude a bedroom of bright coloring and pleasant pattern: nor is it essential to set the exacting standards of a hospital in order to have the bedroom properly sanitary. Painted walls, for instance—sanitary as they are in finish and restful as they can be in coloring—are, of course, suitable for a bedroom: but that is by no means the knell of wallpaper for bedroom decoration. Indeed, if the wallpaper be changed frequently enough, it is entirely satisfactory from the sanitary standpoint; and it is advantageous in providing an excellent nucleus for the complete change of color-scheme which should be made from time to time in any much-used room.

Plain wallpaper is excellent as a background, especially when colorful, patterned fabrics are to be employed for the window-hangings and other accessories scale of living maintained within the home; but it is a very humble house indeed which does not boast of at least one room that is readily convertible into a guest-room. In the home where guests are but rarely entertained over night, it is, of course, the height of folly to set aside for them—and keep vacant the greater part of the time!—the best bedroom of the entire house; though this was a religiously-kept custom up until recent years in most communities. The better plan in a modest home is, instead, to merely turn over one of the family sleeping-rooms to the use of the occasional visitor. And is this any less hospitable in spirit than the practice of former years?

Of bedrooms for servants, much might be written—and, alas, in condemnation! Happily, though, we are at last beginning to realize that servants are human beings; and that, as such, they deserve proper treatment. As a result of this awakening, there has been of recent years a vast improvement made in their sleeping quarters. If "the laborer is worthy of his hire," surely the servants within our homes are entitled to some kindly consideration when the bedrooms of a house are being planned or newly equipped.

The prime purpose of a bedroom is to promote refreshing slumber. That being true, is it not axiomatic that the chief characteristic of a bedroom should be reposefulness? Fortunately, that quality is not difficult to impart. Reposefulness

As these plain papers are so extensively used at present in the other rooms of a house, many successful decorators are, however, indulging their love of interesting design by selecting patterned papers for bedroom walls; choosing, naturally, only the patterns and colorings that are not likely to quickly become wearisome. Small designs, either in pastel or neutral tones, are available in infinite variety. These include grass cloth and other fabric effects, as well as conventionalized floral treatments. Flowers, although usually of more naturalistic arrangement, also enter into the design of many of the larger-patterned wallpapers; the more attractive of these being somewhat misty in effect, as though the design were softly veiled in tulle or chiffon.

That old garden favorite, the hydrangea—its lovely lavender, pink and blue colorings relieved by foliage of silvery-green against an ivory background—patterns one especially alluring bedroom paper. The effect of this paper would be delightful in a room having glass-curtains of silver gauze, with unpatterned inner window-hangings of hydrangea-blue, lined and piped in pale pink, plain velvet rugs and furniture of French gray enamel—enlivened, perhaps, by chair-coverings of pink and gray striped linen. Silver lighting fixtures, shaded in hydrangea-blue over rose, would respond ideally to such a scheme of decoration.

Has brought prettier teeth to millions

The prettier teeth you see everywhere now probably came in this way.

The owners accepted this ten-day test. They found a way to combat film on teeth. Now, as long as they live, they may enjoy whiter, cleaner, safer teeth.

The same way is open to you, and your dentist will urge you to take it.

The war on film

Dentists, the world over, have declared a war on film. That is the cause of dingy teeth — the cause of most tooth troubles.

The viscous film clings to the teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. Old brushing methods left much of it intact. Then it formed the basis of thin cloudy coats, including tartar. Most people's teeth lost luster in that way.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Very few people have escaped these troubles caused by film.

Ways to combat it

Dental science, after long research, has found two ways to combat that film. Able authorities have amply proved their efficiency. So leading dentists the world over now advise their daily use.

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over now. All druggists supply the large tubes.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, avoiding old mistakes. The name is Pepsodent. It does what modern science seeks. These two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Aids Nature's fight

Pepsodent also multiplies Nature's great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth. One is the starch digestant in saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which cling to teeth. In fermenting they form acid.

It also multiplies the alkalinity of saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids—the cause of tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent gives to both these factors a manifold effect.

Show them the way

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

One week will convince you that Pepsodent brings a new era in tooth protection. Then show the results to your children. Teach them this way. Modern dentists advise that children use Pepsodent from the time the first tooth appears.

This is important to you and yours. Cut out the coupon now.

Aunt Belle's Comfort Letters

Thousands of Mothers have thanked me

My Baby Book has really met with a perfectly wonderful reception. It seems as though most of my time for weeks has been spent in reading and answering thousands of delightful letters from mothers thanking me for the help which the Book has been to them.

And most of these letters make special mention of Kora-Konia which my Baby Book advises for all kinds of skin irritation such as prickly heat, diaper rash and teething rash.

Kora-Konia is one of the more recent products of the Mennen laboratories, but personally I think it's the finest thing they make. I am using it constantly in my clinical work and it just makes my heart glow the almost miraculous way it relieves the little tots, restoring inflamed creases of chubby flesh to a healthy pink, and driving away the angry rashes which must torture a baby so.

Kora-Konia is a wonderful healing powder having the peculiar virtue of clinging to the skin for hours, forming a velvety film which protects the skin while it heals it. It is antiseptic and should be used on little cuts and bruises.

Of course, Kora-Konia doesn't take the place of Mennen Borated Talcum which is as necessary as safety pins, but I do wish that every mother in this country would get a box of Kora-Konia at once and learn what a beneficent preparation it is. Every mother has Kora-Konia or can get it for you.

Lovingly,
BELLE

A Complete Text Book on Baby Culture

Written from a mother's viewpoint by a woman with years of experience in bringing up babies, Aunt Belle's Baby Book covers everything from preparation for motherhood through those critical first months to the child's second year.

Beautifully printed and bound and fully indexed, it is the kind of book that would ordinarily sell for at least a dollar. We are mailing it to mothers for 35 cents. Mailed in a plain wrapper.

Pamela Pounce

centre table, dispensing materials, had permitted herself a gratified smile over the snubbing of the English girl. For a moment or two there was silence in the over-lighted, under-ventilated apartment. The season was early July; a blazing white sunshine was pouring down through the casements which their muffled glass but feebly mitigated.

Then the little angry, sharp-toothed mouse that was the bland, coaxing, fluent Eglantine of the showroom found a fresh grievance.

"My God, Mademoiselle Anatoline, are you making a bouquet or tying bristles on a broomstick? And Heaven pardon me, Mademoiselle Eulalie, but if those hands of yours have been washed since—since—What have you been doing with those hands, ma fille? Blacking the boots or scratching your head?"

Anatoline, who was large and fat and fair, became an apoplectic purple; and Eulalie, who was the colour of a lemon with hair like a raven's wing, turned a shade more livid than nature had made her.

There was a titter, beginning sycophantically upon the lips of Mademoiselle Panache. But Pamela's smooth face, white where it was not delicately carnation, might have been that of a handsomely tinted statue. She cut her thread, tweaked one of the shimmering purple loops, and once again putting the hat on her clenched hand, gave it a little shake. The creation was complete!

Madame's swift beady eye rolled in her direction.

"Give yourself the trouble to bring that upstairs to the showroom, Meess," she ordered. "Madame D'Aimargues said she would call, herself, before midday, to try it on before it was sent. I will join you presently and you had better remain, in case there were required an alteration."

"Bien, M'dame," Pamela responded with some alacrity. She might get a whiff of good open air as she went up the stairs. There might even be a window ajar in the showroom. Such a miracle had been known to occur on a very hot day.

Monsieur Ildefonse, Eglantine's husband, was sitting in the little glass cage off the back showroom, pompously referred to as the Bureau. This individual had once been a very noted personality; no other, actually, than the French Queen's appointed coiffeur; in consequence sought after to frenzy by every woman with the smallest pretension to Fashion. Fine ladies had had their heads dressed at six o'clock in the morning, nay, even three days before some special assembly at Court.

To be able to say, with a toss of flying vaporous curls, exquisitely redolent of Poudre à la Maréchale: "In effect, my dear one, Ildefonse's last idea, what do you think of it? It is succeeded. Hein?" To be responded to, perchance, with a cry of envy and despair: "Ildefonse! You managed to get Ildefonse!" And to know your interlocutor, younger than you perhaps, and prettier, yet altogether at a disadvantage, "a positive frump, my dear," under less skilful hands, that had been to reach, in verity, the very needle-peak of feminine triumph, a few years ago.

But star succeeds to star; one Monsieur Charles was Court twiddler, curler, crimper, frizzer, and general head artist. For Monsieur Ildefonse had come into a heritage and retired. Not a fallen star, therefore; merely astronomically removed to another hemisphere! He shone now, though, it may be added, with a doubtful radiance, in a restricted connubial circle; in other words, he sat at home and totted up accounts for his clever, money-making spouse; made bargains for her with flower manufacturers and mercers, and bullied the stewards of great houses when Madame la Duchesse or Madame la Connétable forgot to remember such insignificances as the settlement of bills.

Unanimously the workgirls adored him, with the single exception of Pamela; and the relations between Madame Eglantine and her consort, characterised in public by the most touching demonstrativeness, were regarded as the very romance of matrimony. But Pamela, who had come under the glance, more often than she cared, of Monsieur Ildefonse's slyly roving eye, had her private opinion.

She shuddered from him as she had shuddered from the fat, sleek, brown slugs that came out after rain on the garden walls at home.

As a little girl she would explain: "Tain't that I'm afraid, you see, but it makes me creep."

She could have found no better words in which to describe the effect upon her of the fascinating Monsieur Ildefonse.

There was a midday lull, this scorching day, even in Madame Eglantine's thriving establishment. It was late season, too, and save for orders like that of the little Marquise D'Aimargues, for such as were privileged to join in the pastimes of Royal haymaking and churning, or a stray wedding order, business was slack, and the great little milliner herself was preparing for that round of the most noted watering places, with "just a few models" in her baggage, which was her thrifty fashion of spending the holidays.

Pamela cast, in passing, a hasty glance between the green curtains of the Bureau, to assure herself that her pet aversion was safely employed.

He had removed his wig on account of the heat, and she turned her eyes quickly away from the revolting spectacle of his close-cropped bristling black head and the roll of olive fat at the back of his neck above the embroidered collar of his blue cloth coat.

The pink, be-padded, be-wreathed, be-gilded, be-mirrored, be-padded salons of Madame Eglantine were empty. Pamela walked slowly into the middle of the front room and hesitated. Her own charming shape was reflected from every possible angle. Down below, the whole Place seemed asleep; a buzz of flies within and without, a lazy footfall on the shady side and a distant rumble emphasized the universal drowsiness.

When Madame la Marquise's coach came along there would be a prodigious clatter to wake them all up. Pamela knew that she was quite safe. It's all very well to trim a hat. You never know what it's like till you've tried it on.

Very deliberately she divested her glossy chestnut hair of its discreet cap, loosened the swelling waves a trifle more on either side of the firm rose-tinted ivory of her face.

"If a dash of powder was for poor girls like me, I wouldn't be too bad-looking. I'd say that for myself," she thought, and firmly set the hat of the Marquise at the right angle over her radiant brow.

Well, it was a complete success. Like every true artist she was doubly critical of herself, but Pamela had to admit that she could find no flaw in her own taste and that the wide-brimmed curving Italian straw with its bold sweep of purple ribbon, and its hanging bunches of cowslips was a remarkably fine set-off for the glory of her amber hair and the audacious brilliance of her complexion. Without a tinge of envy or discontent she surveyed herself thoughtfully.

"Upon my word, Pamela Pounce, my girl!"—she was fond of addressing herself mentally; as it were her strong reasonable mind to her agreeable body. "You would have held your own with the best of them if it had been the fancy of Providence to set you in the aristocracy. Ugh!"

With a piercing scream she started out of her complacent reflection.

A horrible olive-hued, leering face appeared over her shoulder in the mirror; a blue-clothed arm stole round her waist.

Pamela swung herself free, whisked the hat off her head ready to use it as a weapon should Monsieur Ildefonse pursue his advances.

In the dead pause the quick rustle of

Madame Eglantine's light summer flounces were heard on the stairs.

Instantly the ex-hairdresser's countenance lost its satyr smiles, and became composed into its usual mask of smooth propriety.

"Is that you, mon Agneau rose?" he cooed.

"Yes, yes, it is I, petit rat de mon cœur," she replied.

These endearments having perfunctorily passed between them, Madame halted on the threshold and sent the glitter of her swift glance from her spouse to her apprentice.

"I took the liberty of trying on the hat what I've just trimmed, M'dame," said Pamela then in her brazen way.

She wasn't going to put it into Monsieur Ildefonse's power to tell on her behind her back, or worse still, to pretend to be shielding her. She knew his slimy ways.

"You do well to call it a liberty," said Madame Ildefonse, showing all her small pointed teeth as if she wanted to bite Pamela. She was panting a little, and there was a sort of whiteness about her nostrils that pointed to considerable if repressed emotion. "But let it pass. You were giving your opinion, I presume, my cabbage-stalk?"

"Meess very naturally wished me to admire your exquisite taste, ma tendre biche," he responded. "No one," says she to me, 'but Madame Eglantine could have made this inimitable, this absolutely original and distinguished combination, all the while retaining the stamp of the most high tone.'

Monsieur Ildefonse was very glib of tongue.

"A-ah!" said Madame, smiling horribly. "You and Meess flatter me in your private conversations."

"My charmer, how can I console myself in your absence, except by—" he broke off, for at that moment, with sounds of pomp, a thunder of hoofs, a crash and a clatter, the street woke up indeed, as Miss Pounce had prognosticated. And Madame D'Aimargues drove up in her four-horsed coach.

Madame Eglantine cast off her rage, as one may divest oneself of a garment, to be re-assumed at the chosen moment; Monsieur Ildefonse, with a relieved shrug of his huge shoulders, began to retire, cat-footed, to his den.

"Remain as you are, Meess," commanded the milliner, now entirely concentrated on the exigencies of her business.

She shook out her flounces and summoning the bland business smile to her features cast a swift glance at the nearest mirror before taking two steps to greet her valuable patroness.

It was that glance at the mirror which precipitated the catastrophe. By some counter-reflection, Madame Eglantine's jealous eyes caught a vision of Ildefonse, her husband, her cabbage, the little rat of her heart, pausing in his turn to cast a final ogle upon the abandoned, the sly, the seductive, the shameless Meess!

Eglantine beheld that ogle. She swallowed her emotion. She was above all femme d'affaires. Everything must give way before the profit of the moment. She could wait.

The little Marquise, blonde and slim and rouged, ethereal yet vivid, fluttered in, fanning herself, tried on her hat, chattered, laughed, approved, exclaimed upon the heat, and, still fanning herself, departed, leaving on Pamela's mind the impression of a glittering butterfly, as lovely, as useless, and as impalpable. You could crush her, thought the girl, between finger and thumb.

Her serious lambent gaze had hardly followed the radiant apparition to the door, when the explosion burst forth.

It was all the more devastating for having been withheld.

Wanton! Hussy! Baggage! Designing intriguing slut! Meess de Malheur! What was Pamela, after all, but a stray apprentice, and an English one at that, flung upon her, Madame Eglantine's, benevolence for the sake of old friendship, living on charity, a beggar! Cette Lydie, how she had haggled! But if such wickedness had been paid for in all the gold of false Albion, Madame Eglantine would not have kept her, to the destruction of her domestic happiness!

"Meess, you pack this day."

She further added a flood of vituperation, to which Pamela, all her pretty carnations dead on her white cheeks, listened in a fixed silence.

When the French woman had run herself out of breath on a high scream, Pamela answered her in English, which the whilom Bath milliner spoke brokenly, but understood perfectly. "That'll do, M'dame. I'm as pleased to get out of this place as ever you can be to see the back of me. As for that fat husband of yours, I wouldn't touch him with a pair of tongs. And as for yourself, I'd not remain a moment longer than I can help with one as doesn't know the meaning of truth, and would take an honest girl's character away out of pure spite and malice. And don't you dare," pursued Pamela, with a swelling voice, "say anything against my character, or as sure as there is justice in Heaven, I'll bring your business about your ears. I'll tell that old cat, my Aunt Lydia, what's happened, that you caught your horrid old Ildefonse ogling me in the glass, and that you haven't that trust in him—and sure, I'm with you there, for he ain't fit to be trusted the length of your apron, and so I tell you fair—you haven't that trust in him that you could have another moment of peace with me under your roof. God help you; I don't blame you! Give me the price of my ticket home, and I'll see Aunt don't get at you over the indenture."

For all her courage, for all the longing which the thought of England brought her, the heart of Pamela Pounce was heavy as lead. She knew that at the Kentish farm, things were going badly with the yeoman; she knew that she dared not add the burden of her penniless self to that which rested on his shoulders. She knew that odious as it would be, that abominably as her relative would abuse of the situation, there would be nothing for it, but to throw herself again on her Aunt Lydia's family feeling, as soon as the Dover coach landed her in London town.

Her aunt was now with her mistress in Hertford Street, back from the Wells, according to the latest reports, and that was one bit of luck; another was, that judging by the tone of the letter just received by Madame Eglantine with an order for hats, my Lady Kilcroney's maid was in the highest exultation over her mistress's royal promotion.

CHAPTER III

IN WHICH MISS PAMELA POUNCE, THE MILLINER'S ASSISTANT, BECOMES ARBITER OF LIFE AND DEATH IN HIGH SOCIETY

"Pray Mrs. Tabbishaw," wrote my Lady Kilcroney's woman to the Mantua-maker in Cheapside, "send Pamela along with those white feathers of her ladyship's, which you has, this ever so long, to be died blew, yours obleeged,

"Lydia Pounce."

NOW the fact of Pamela being Lydia's niece did not endear her to that maturing damsel, "which," she was fond of remarking to any beholding them together, "do seem prodigious absurd, seeing as how there's scarce a year or two betwixt us."

But if Miss Lydia was not fond of displaying herself in public with a fine strapping young woman of twenty-three who had an inconsiderate way of dropping out "Aunt" at every second word ("which, reely, my dear, I vow she does a' purpose"—and perhaps indeed she did), my Lady Kilcroney's indispensable Abigail, as she never omitted informing all and sundry, had a remarkable sense of family feeling. She had placed the inconvenient niece

Jellies and Jams

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

THERE are many reasons why the thrifty housewife desires to have always on hand, a store of fruit jellies, and jams. They are the most wholesome forms in which sugar may be presented in food. With the breakfast toast or muffins, on the invalid's tray or for the children's lunch, they are almost indispensable, and for cake and tart fillings they are most acceptable. Jellies make attractive garnishes for cold meat and desserts and put up in usual sized glasses or jars they make popular gifts. A box or basket holding one-half dozen small glasses of jelly, each a different color and flavor, is most attractive and always acceptable.

Jelly-making is a simple process if one keeps in mind a few general rules and principles. Failures can usually be traced to one of four causes:— use of over-ripe fruit, use of too much sugar, cooking too large a quantity of fruit juice at one time, or using fruits lacking in pectin without adding something to supply the lack.

Fruit juice is largely water which holds in solution small quantities of flavouring fruit product and its use has been endorsed by chemistry and food experts. In addition to making it possible to make jelly of all fruit juices, this product has several other advantages. It makes it possible to preserve the rich flavor of fully ripened fruit in jellies and jams and it increases the yield and lessens the time spent in preparation. A much larger proportion of sugar is used, but because of the increased yield, the finished product is no sweeter and little, if any more, expensive than jelly or jam made without this product. The chief object in boiling the fruit juice with the sugar is to concentrate to the point where jelly will be formed. Ordinarily this takes from twenty to thirty minutes, during which much evaporation and a consequent loss of color and flavor takes place. By the addition of this product, boiling may be reduced to one minute, the result being a much greater yield and better flavor and color. Directions for use come with each bottle.

Preparation of Fruit for Jelly Making
Wash hard fruits, such as apples, quinces, pears, etc., but do not remove skins.

Good jelly-making fruits substances, sugar, vegetable acids and—most important for the purposes of jelly-making—a substance called pectin. Jelly results from boiling the pectin containing juices with the proper proportion of sugar, provided acid is present. The pectin must be cooked out of the fruit, but it is weakened or partly destroyed by too long boiling. Some fruits are very rich in this jelly-making substance while others have very little. If pectin is present in the juice it may be made into jelly, if it is absent no jelly can be made unless artificial means are employed; hence the choice of fruit is a most important point in jelly-making. Currants, sour apples, crab-apples, grapes not fully ripe, and quinces, are generously supplied with pectin, while strawberries and cherries are deficient. The deficiency may be overcome by combining the juice with a fruit juice rich in pectin. Apples are most often used in combination with other fruits, to supply pectin, as the apple juice is mild and will not obscure the desired flavor. Over-ripe fruit is almost entirely deficient in pectin and it is impossible to make jelly of it unless commercial pectin is added. The quantity of acids present in the fruit also effects the jelling qualities of the juice. Sour apples, sour currants, and unripe grapes are almost sure to yield choice jelly. Until quite recently, only fruits known to be rich in pectin were used to any great extent in home jelly making. There is now on the market a product containing pectin in a highly concentrated form. It is manufactured in a well-known Canadian town. It is a pure

Cut up and put in a saucepan, cores, seeds, and all. (The skins, seeds, and stones give flavor and color to the jelly.) Barely cover with water and cook until soft. Place in a jelly bag and drain until pulp is dry. Do not press the bag. Crush soft fruits (currants, grapes, berries, etc.) with a wooden spoon or pestle, add enough water to prevent burning and heat slowly over the fire. When hot, pour into a jelly bag and let drip. To make a second extraction from either hard or soft fruits, return the pulp from the jelly bag to the saucepan, add enough water to prevent burning and heat through. Return to jelly bag and let drip again.

Making the Juice into Jelly. Have everything at hand before putting the fruit juice to boil. Have everything that comes in contact with the juice hot, heat the sugar before adding it, and have glasses standing in hot water. Measure fruit juice, bring it to the boiling point quickly, let it boil five minutes and add the heated sugar. Stir until the sugar dissolves then boil rapidly until the mixture stiffens, when dropped on a cold plate, or until it falls in a sheet from the spoon. Skim while the juice is boiling and again after the sugar is added. Pour while hot into hot sterilized glasses. Make jelly in small quantities. They can be handled more safely and successfully.

Sealing Jelly. When the jelly is cold have ready pieces of paraffin paper, cut to the size of the top of the jelly glass. Press these on the top of the jelly. Also

To employ any patterned wallpaper successfully, it is essential to exercise the greatest restraint in the use of pictures. Indeed, the safest plan is to omit pictures altogether. If, however, some form of applied wall decoration seems to be needed, simply framed mirrors are entirely appropriate. Patterns in hangings, rugs and chair coverings should be avoided; unless they be very inconspicuous, as in some of the self or two-toned designs.

Plain rugs carrying a broad border in a slightly darker shade are always desirable for bedroom use. They are pleasantly restful in appearance—and their patternless surface serves to counter-balance the pattern that is almost inevitable in either the wall paper or the window-hangings. The rugs should, of course, repeat some color used elsewhere in the room; whether in the window-hangings, the wallpaper or the furniture. As a rule, too, the darker hues are preferable; they not only suggest the strength which we demand in floor construction, but they stand the wear and tear of everyday use much better than the more delicate colorings.

Rag rugs for the bedroom were never more popular than they are to-day: in part, probably, because they can be obtained in an almost endless variety of colors, from the very faint pastel tints to shades that are nearly sombre, and in every conceivable combination. The rag rugs in solid color with contrasting stripes introduced at each end and the old-fashioned "hit-and-miss" weaves are equally effective. Rag rugs of the "hit-and-miss" type in foamy sea-green shell-pink and old ivory adorn one very charming guest room, in which the furniture of quaint design is painted a light sea-green and the walls are hung with a faintly-striped ivory-white paper. In this instance, the rugs not only repeat the hue of the furniture, but they echo the coloring of the glazed English chintz chosen for the window-hangings, chair-coverings and bedspread: a creamy-white fabric carrying an all-over pattern of slumbrous pink poppies and soft green foliage.

For a bedroom decorated in the Colonial style, the round or oval braided rag rugs are rather more attractive than the conventional oblong woven rugs. The old-fashioned hooked rug in all the glory of its colorful pictorial design is also suitable for a Colonial room, although its employment there should curtail the use of other patterns. That, however, need not beget monotony. Let the walls be hung with a paper of soft golden-yellow and the windows with little ruffled curtains of white dotted Swiss and any room will form a cheerful and appropriate setting for old mahogany furniture and gay hooked rugs.

Although taffeta is very extensively employed—and with very delightful results from the purely decorative standpoint!—for the curtaining of bedroom windows, it is not altogether satisfactory economically. In the first place, it lacks the durability which the average home-maker demands when any considerable monetary outlay is involved. Furthermore, taffeta cannot be washed without impairment. It is, therefore, scarcely likely to dislodge from popular favor chintz, cretonne and block-linen, all of which can be laundered times without number—if reasonable care be used. For use next the glass, the "tie-back" ruffled curtains of dotted Swiss are apparently perennially popular, although they have rather a formidable rival in the straight-hanging hemstitched curtains of marquise, scrim, net or gauze.

In the planning and furnishing of a bedroom, the very important matter of artificial illumination frequently receives but scant attention—to the subsequent annoyance and general discomfort of the occupants of the room! Under ideal auspices, there should be several quite distinct lighting centres; whether or not a central ceiling-light be installed. Comwith the matchless Eglantine. With such a start in life she considered the girl's fortune made; and if Paris were to become the stable abode of so much bloom and bumptiousness, she, for one, would continue to bear the separation with fortitude.

When, after two or three years' absence, however, Pamela reappeared on the scene, extraordinarily Frenchified, unconscionably beautified, and quite unpardonably wideawake, having quarrelled to the death with Madame Eglantine, and possessing, to boot, only the clothes on her back and the price of her ticket, Miss Lydia Pounce was very justly annoyed. It was quite impossible to send the girl home, since bankruptcy threatened the Kentish farm. Once again Lydia's fine conception of family obligation came to the fore. There was Mrs. Tabbishaw, at whose second-rate establishment in Cheapside the elder Miss Pounce had been in the habit of having such odd jobs done for her ladyship as the dyeing and re-curling of feathers, the cleaning and mending of unimportant laces, the quilting of winter petticoats. Mrs. Tabbishaw owed her a good turn, and if she would now make room for Pamela, give her board and just enough wage for her clothes, Lydia would see to it that her mistress should go as far as to purchase an occasional hat.

Pamela had no choice but to fall in with her aunt's arrangements, for had not Madame Eglantine sworn that she would give her no character? (As if, indeed, it had been her fault that that odious Monsieur Ildefonse should take to ogling behind Madame's back, and her staring into the mirror!) She knew very well, however, that she was sadly wasted at the poor, unmodish place; and, indeed, since Mrs. Tabbishaw was too stupid to realise the treasure that had come her way, the younger Miss Pounce was forthwith turned into a maid-of-all-work. Her long, clever fingers were set to scrub and to cook, to pink or to quilt, or to whatever odd job pressed the most. She was kept running to and fro with parcels, and up and downstairs on messages. She was sent galloping to shops and warehouses to match ribbons and velvets, and all the while the wives and daughters of the city went on purchasing the modes of the year before last, as interpreted by vulgar minds, while spirit, delicacy, art, dash, millinery genius in fine, was actually within their reach! Not that Pamela Pounce had any desire to adorn them. Her aspirations flew very high. Some day she meant to be as great in her line as Eglantine herself, to exercise her talents upon heads as worth while as my Lady Kilcroney's own.

"You're jealous of me, you cat!" It was thus she apostrophised the worthy Aunt Lydia in the solitude of her bare attic chamber. "You're jealous of me. You know you're an old maid and peevish, and I'm only twenty-three and better-looking than you ever were in your life, with twice your wits, though yours are as sharp as your elbows. You think I'd take the shine out of you, you lemon-faced thing! You know I'd toss up a bit of lace and feather for your ladyship's boudoir cap, and that her ladyship would nigh faint with the ecstasy of it when she saw herself in the glass. And a sweet pretty creature she is—the one glimpse I ever had of her, and that through the door, you mean thing! Ah, give me a chance, and I swear the sedans and the carriages would be blocking the streets to get at me. But not if you can help it, old Miss Pounce! You're to be the only important Miss Pounce in this world; that's your little game! But 'tis not for nothing I've got it all in me!"

And hugging her knees as she sat on her bed—the chair being too rickety to bear her fine proportions—Miss Pounce the younger would map out her future in glorious processions of feathers and head-dresses, hats and bonnets, wreaths and négligés.

Through all the hardships, the dreary daily grind, the unkindness and the unremitting exertions, her star shone upon her with a light that never wavered. The first winter was a trying one, and Pamela found London, after Paris, a cruel, ugly place; a cruel cold one, and a cruel hard one. When the summer came, existence might be easier, but the hours were longer with the daylight, and there were nights when even Pamela's high heart gave way, and she would drop on her pallet bed almost too exhausted to sleep. She had grown thin, and there was a certain fierceness in the fire of her bright grey eyes, as if they looked on all humanity as an enemy, by that July 16th, 1789, when my Lady Kilcroney's woman wrote for the "blew feathers."

"Oh, drat!" said Mrs. Tabbishaw.

She was just sitting down to her dinner at three o'clock in the afternoon of a torrid day. The reek of roast duck and sage and onions was succulently in the air, and there was a tankard of porter facing and winking amber bubbles beside her plate already.

"Drat!" Mrs. Tabbishaw took a gulp of the porter, and waddled to the door to scream: "Those blue feathers, where the deuce were they put? Pamela! Pamela! I say, where is that girl? My chest is wore out screeching for her. Where's Pamela, Miss Trotter, dear?"

"Just a-setting down to bread-and-cheese in the scullery," screamed a thin voice from the countinghouse.

"Setting down! It's like her impudence! Send for her this moment, Miss Trotter. Tell her she's got to take my Lady Kilcroney's blue feathers to Hertford Street this very minute. Tell her it's pressing, Miss Trotter. And stay, look out my lady's bill, which Miss Pounce promised me to have settled this while back, and it twelve pound odd. Tell the chit to ask her aunt for it. I'm none too fond of letting fine ladies' bills run up, and it all for odds and ends that are scarce worth my doing. And, hark ye, tell her she'll have to hurry back too, with that pinking to finish to-night for Mrs. Alderman Gruntle's cradle, and her eleventh due any time."

...

"For mercy's sake, Aunt Lydia," said Pamela Pounce, as much to that damsel's surprise and annoyance she was ushered in upon her by Pompey, the black page. "Give me a bit of bread-and-butter, and a drink of Bohea, for I declare to Heaven I'm starving. And I've brought you the feathers. And they're dyed a dreadful blue, I think; but once you give anything over to Mrs. Tabbishaw you get the mark of her paw upon it, and so I tell you."

"'Twould be well if she put the mark of her paw upon you, miss, for your impudence. Bread-and-butter, quotha! And I'm sure 'tis a good thing if you are a trifle fined down from the gross size you was when you came back from Paris. 'Dear me,' says my lord's new man to me, when he caught sight of you, 'that's a prize one! She'd make ten of you,' he says; and him so genteel, I blushed to hear him."

"Oh, that fellow!" Pounce the younger tossed her head; "waylaying me on the stairs to say I couldn't be a Pounce, being so—well, so vastly different from you, Aunt Lydia. And begging to see me home; as if I'd let him—a valet, indeed!"

"Upon my word!" Lydia's faded, sallow, pretty countenance went a trifle more sallow, and looked considerably less pretty. "Who's to talk of impudence, I'd like to know, and what do you expect, miss?"

"Somebody considerably less like stripes and buttons. If I don't get a gentleman one day, Aunt—"

"A gentleman? La, hear her!"

"I'll go single, like yourself."

Pamela's full light grey eyes became abstracted. Anon, as she had turned in at the area railings, a young gentleman had dashed by her up the steps, and had set the knocker thundering against the panels of the hall door. As she had looked up he had looked down at her; and then he had smiled, and made a little gesture towards his hat, which if not the courtesy he would have paid to one of his own class, was nevertheless a genial, pleasant salute. She thought she had never seen so handsome a countenance; come under the gaze of such flashing dark eyes. There would be a lad for one who was lucky enough to be able to go in at the front door!

And, indeed, miss—
Lydia wheeled round, and perceiving Pompey lingering, all one grin, tweaked his wool.

"How dare you, you little blackamore! What are you doing here?"

"He's waiting for orders to get me a cup of chocolate and a bit of cake, aren't you, Pompey?" cried the quite audacious Pamela. "I'm sure my Lady'll never miss it. And as soon as I've got it to give, I'll give you a crownpiece, Pompey."

She laughed on the little boy, and when Pamela Pounce laughed, she was something to look on; for her wide, fresh mouth curled so deliciously, and the corners of it went up so gaily, and she had such fine, white, even teeth, and as the dimples came and went, she gained such adorable little lines of fun about half-shut eyes, and the most engaging little crinkle in her cocked nose!

"La!" Mrs. Tabbishaw's slavey cast herself into her aunt's arm-chair, untied the ribbons of her wide straw hat, and flung it on the table. She ran her long fingers, surprisingly white in spite of their toil, through the roughened curls of her chestnut hair, stretched her long legs luxuriously, and contemplating the dust on her shabby shoes: "Thought I should have dropped, I did," she cried, "when I come into Shepherd's Market—three big feathers and two little ones, Aunt Lydia! And, la, the blue! 'Tis the peacockest vile colour, I ever—And oh, here's my Lady's bill! And old Tabby must have it paid. She's all swears and spits and furlflying about it, as it is. 'Get your aunt to pay,' she says, 'for her beggarly odds and ends that don't bring an honest body a bit of worth while,' and oh!" she yawned outrageously, "I'm o hurry back, no less, for Mrs. Alderman Gruntle's eleventh is waiting on my pinking."

"My lady's account!" Lydia snatched the written sheet from her niece's hand: "Of all the—there, that's what comes o' dealing with them second-class shops. Mrs. Tabbishaw thinks my Lady can be treated like one of her City bodies, I declare."

"I'm not to go back without the money," said Pamela.

"Dear, to be sure! And my Lady so put about as never! What with her new hat being such a failure, and her out of sorts, too, over her gown for the Birthday, she about to take up her first turn as Lady-in-Waiting into the bargain—Court friends being that spiteful, and my Lord having the ill luck at Whites, and Bellairs' young nephew, Mr. Jocelyn, an audacious, gaming, young rascal, if ever I see one, as set on the dice as my Lord, and him but a beggar, so to speak. And my Lady paying his passage back to India twice over, to my certain knowledge, and him losing it on the green cloth within the hour! Well, my Lady's done with him, that's one good thing. 'Tain't the moment for Tabbishaw, and so I tell you!"

"Why, la!" Pamela had a graceful, lazy mockery in her eyes and voice which, however ill-placed in one of her humble station, somehow became her. "My Lord must have been, indeed, uncommon out of luck, if my Lady Kilcroney, her as every one knows is a-rolling in old Bellairs' money, can't pay twelve sovereigns to a poor shop in the City. But give me back the bill, Aunt, and I'll tell Mrs. Tabbishaw she's got to wait till my Lord casts a better tot."

Lady Kilcroney's maid gazed at her audacious relative as if deprived of speech.

Nevertheless, in all her wrath there was a certain grudging admiration.

"The girl's as insolent as if she'd been born a lady!"

The thought flashed across her mind as she whisked through the door brandishing the account. On the threshold the power of language returned to her.

"As if twelve sovereigns wasn't as many farthings to one of my Lady's wealth!"

Here she nearly cannoned against Pompey with a tray, and bidding him wait to be dealt with till his hands were empty of chocolate, disappeared, objugating, down the passage.

Pamela was half-way through her second cup of chocolate, vastly refreshed and comforted by it, and the agreeable little cakes which had accompanied it, when her relative returned, with a red spot on either cheek bone, her nostrils dilated over panting breaths. She had all the air of one who emerges from a wrestle. The light of battle, was still in her eye, but of battle victorious.

"Here, miss," she cried, "thirteen sovereigns to settle your Tabbishaw, and milady says you can keep the change. Gave me all sorts, she did, being, as who should know better than I, from early morning, my dear, in as peevish a temper as ever was. And—and what she can do in that way," said Lydia, turning up her eyes, "you'd never believe if you hadn't seen, the world being made up of Diddumses. There wasn't an item along here she didn't have her scratch at, and in the end, she says: 'For Heaven's sake stop talking!' (That's how poor servants is treated).

"You'll have me reeling in the head," she says. 'Take thirteen sovereigns from my purse, and get out of my room and don't let me hear another word of that there maddening bill!' And so you can keep the change, my love. And, if you'd believe it, just out of cussedness, the young gentleman what's annoyed her so prodigious has the boldness to come knocking at our hall door and demanding urgent, through Mr. Blandfoot, the butler, a few moments' conversation with her ladyship. My Lady having given orders that he was not to be admitted, the scamp sends for the butler—well, that's about dished him, I can tell you!"

"Tell him, Blandfoot," says my lady, 'that I don't give alms at the door. Tell him,' she says, 'to go and earn his living. I don't hold,' she says, 'with able-bodied beggars!'"

Oh," said Pamela, her thoughts flying back with compassion to the dashing young gentleman on the doorstep, "what a cruel thing to say. 'Tis insulting misfortune."

"Insulting fiddlesticks! Here, hasten, baggage, or you'll lose your good place, and I've had enough of you for one day, I can tell you that."

"And what a darling, sweet auntie you are!" said the second Miss Pounce, as she tied on her shepherdess hat with knowing little peeps at the mirror. "'Tain't any wonder I love you. Ta-ta."

She dropped the sovereigns into her worn reticule, kissed her hand from the door in sarcastic farewell, and departed.

With fourteen shillings and two pence to the good in her pocket, Pamela felt a singular sense of independence. Instead of hurrying back into the heat, crowd, and toil of Cheapside, she turned her steps towards Hyde Park, the green boughs of which seemed to beckon to her from the top of the street.

"I'll go and sit under the trees," thought the girl. "An idea for a hat has come into my mind, and I'll work it out and let Mrs. Alderman Gruntle and her cradle and the pinking go to the deuce."

She found a retired spot in the shade, and, the turf being dry and inviting, stretched herself luxuriously at full length to stare upwards at the odd little triangles and stars of blue sky visible through the interlacing leaves above her.

Composing her hat with the zest of a poet his verses, she lay at ease, in great portable dressing, for example, calls for a serviceable light directly above or at the side of the bureau. A bedside light is almost equally necessary; and, even in a small bedroom, a good reading-light beside an armchair and table or over a desk is very desirable.

The shading of all the bedroom lights should invariably be uniform, for nothing is more incongruous than a conglomeration of unrelated shades. Although the shades of hand-decorated parchment and of softly gathered silk are entirely suitable for bedroom use, less conservative shades for this service are now being shown in chestnut is a thing of beauty only, for even the nut-loving squirrels will have none of it.

The seedtime of the willow is not in Autumn, for the blossom-time that gives the bees their earliest honey feast in spring is succeeded by a correspondingly early ripening of the seed. There are two kinds of flowers at the same time, the prettiest of which form the catkins that we call 'pussy-willow.' The other type of flower develops the seeds packed in tiny pods, which open and set free the seeds, each one provided with a fuzzy sail like a dandelion seed.

White wallpaper and snowy dimity, each bearing a scattered pattern of tiny pink moss-rosebuds, add very materially to the charm of this quaintly-furnished little room. The dimity is used to cushion several chairs of mignonette-green wicker, that have been introduced as a contrast to the other furniture, which is furnished in white enamel. Some of the white-enameled chairs carry narrow lines of the mignonette-green and the same lovely grayish-green, in conjunction with rose, gray and white, appears in the "hit-and-miss" rag rugs that are so appropriately employed as a floor-covering. The bed is clothed entirely in immaculate white, just as in Colonial days: and be-frilled white dotted Swiss curtains are hung in the many-paned windows.

other materials. Filet-lace, mounted on tinted silk or gauze, is attractive; but even more interesting are the shades of gingham or organdy. The gingham shades are usually somewhat severe in their lines; even when decorated with a contrasting, Mid-Victorian fringe of yarn. On the other hand, the organdy shades are, as a rule, fluffiness itself—suggestive almost of the many frilled hoopskirts of a bygone day!—and blossomlike in color.

And now, with pleasant outlook and invigorating atmosphere, with agreeable walls and harmonious hangings, with appropriate rugs and comfort-bringing lights, with suitable space for furniture and ample place for treasured belongings, what bedroom could be other than invitingly reposeful?

The seed of the white ash resembles that of the maple, the winged keys are joined in twos or threes and hang in clusters in the branches, often clinging there until far into the following winter.

Pines, spruce, fir, balsam and hemlock hide their seeds within cones, which as they ripen turn downward, showering the seeds upon the ground below.

The seeds of the Dogwood and Sumach, and of the Mountain Ash are well hidden within a fleshy outside covering, as is the seed of a cherry. The Dogwood and the Ash bear their brilliant 'berries' in gay clusters of red and the Sumach conceals the seed in a crimson cone that lasts far through the winter.

content, when she was startled by the sound of rapid footsteps on the sward.

She sat up and beheld a young man, a very fine and modish-looking young gentleman indeed, who advanced with great strides, brought himself to a sudden halt within the shady little dell, and casting swift looks from side to side, as if to make sure he was not observed, flung his hat on the ground and stood staring.

Pamela, shielded from observation by a clump of bushes, watched with a sudden and inexplicable feeling of apprehension, which grew as she caught sight of a drawn countenance, deathly pale.

"For sure," thought she, "the poor gentleman's desperate!"

The next instant she sprang to her feet with a scream; he had drawn a pistol from his breast pocket and, with an odd jerk, almost as if forced by some malevolent power which he could not withstand, raised it to his temple.

Pamela was one of those rare beings in whom swift wits unite with swift action. She hurled herself upon the would-be suicide and wrenched the weapon from his hand. For a strange moment they stood facing each other, eye into eye. It seemed to her as if the whole world held nothing but those mad eyes of his, dilated, starting, haunted; the pupils were contracting and expanding in the violet irises as with some dreadful pulse of his heart. Suddenly his whole being relaxed; he smiled.

"Good heavens," she cried, "'tis the young gentleman on the doorstep!"

"And you," said he, "are the young lady in the area. If the next world's as odd as this, 'twill be a vastly comic place."

"Oh!" cried Pamela, who did not at all like this reference to Eternity. Still less did she like the manner in which he put out his hand towards the pistol.

"By your leave, my dear. My property, I believe?"

She strove to avoid his grasp; she fought to keep the weapon in her hand. "Why, what farce is this?" he exclaimed, laughing. "What do you imagine, my good girl? May not an actor practise his greatest scene without—? Why, what prodigious nonsense have you got into your pretty head? The thing's not even loaded!"

"Ah, but what did you say yourself just now?"

She was a vigorous creature, and terror lent her strength. She remained in possession of the dangerous implement.

"What did I say? I merely tired the effect of my most telling speech upon you—with fine result. If my public are as impressionable—"

Once more he stretched out his hand, but, leaping from him, the girl raised the pistol, aimed at the nearest bush, pulled the trigger, and fired.

As the reverberations died away she turned a face, drained of colour but triumphant, upon him.

"So much for your story, Mr. Actor!" cried she.

"Why, you're too quick for me!" he answered, with a moody change, thrust his hands into his pockets, began to pace the dell backwards and forwards before her, kicking his hat each time he passed it.

She thought that he was no more than a boy, for all his manly growth, and her heart went out to him.

"Here, give me the pistol," he said. "Tush, child, 'tis safe enough for the moment. We'll be having the park-keeper upon us to see who's been murdered. Let us look innocent."

"Oh, oh," she shuddered, "if I had not been there!"

"Nay, my dear, I'm in no mood to thank you, I protest. Yet 'tis something to have had a vision of a pretty face and a kind, womanly spirit at the last."

"There you go again! Sir, sir!"

She surrendered the smoking pistol, and, as he slipped it into his pocket:

"Farewell, my dear," said he

"Ah, no!" She clutched his arm by both hands. "You shall not go till you have promised me—promised me on your honour as a gentleman to spare yourself."

"I could do that, on my honour," he answered her; "but that I will not quibble before such true eyes. Nevertheless it is to spare myself that I seek death. You bid me on my honour. 'Tis because I cannot live dishonoured that I hold this pistol to my temples. 'Tis not that I don't love life as well as another man, or better. 'Fore Heaven, it is because I have loved life too well. Had I as much as a guinea in my pocket I would have defied Fate. When I stood on those steps and rapped that knocker a while ago, I swear I had as little thought of blowing my brains out as you had. When you and I smiled at each other I thought this world a very good place, I do assure you. That woman in her fine house yonder, rolling in luxury, with her lap dog and her chocolate and her black page, her jewels and her laces, her silks and her satins; all in her cushions; that woman, I say, who finds the Bellairs' money of so vast a use to spend, might have given me a ten-pound note out of her store."

"When all's said and done, I'm the only Bellairs left. And, if but a nephew by marriage, nevertheless the last kin of her old Nabob. Ten pounds I asked of her—that contemptible sum! And what did I receive? The vilest insult, through the most insulting medium. Odds my life, when I think of it—"

He clenched his hands.

Pamela stood, reflecting profoundly, one needle-marked finger to her lip, her white brows drawn together under the shade of her hat.

Ten pounds to save a man's honour. It seemed indeed a strangely small sum! As if he read her thought, he broke forth:

"I dreamt last night, three times over, that I tossed a double six at tric-trac, and 'tis the sixteenth of July and I am twenty-six. My Lord Sanquhar promised to give me my revenge at the Six Bells at six of the clock. 'Twas such a conjunction of luck as could not fail. I would have won back my I.O.U.'s. I would have returned my Lady Kilcroney the passage money to India. She wants to ship me to India, my dear, the inconvenient poor relation. Ah, she need not fear. I shall beg from her no more. What a farce it has all been! 'Tis time to put an end to it. Bless you for your sweet looks, my pretty child. Think of me only as one who, after life's fitful fever, sleeps well. Aha! I shall sleep better I dare say, than my Lady Kilcroney when she has read the letter I sent to her anon!"

"One moment, Mr. Bellairs, since that's your name," said Pamela Pounce, with her wide, lovely smile. She dived into her reticule, and began to gather the coins together with counting digits. "If you'll condescend to borrow of a person who goes in by the area gates, here are thirteen sovereigns at your service. I've just had a long bill paid me. And, oh," cried Pamela, suddenly and unexpectedly bursting into tears, "I wish they were three hundred!"

"Gracious heavens!" said the young gentleman.

"If you don't take them I'll never know another happy moment," sobbed Pamela. "Oh, how could I? Oh, sir, don't say 'No,' because I am just a poor girl."

"Nay then, I won't say 'No.' Upon my soul, I don't care if you go in at the coal hole, you've the finest spirit and the prettiest face, ay, and the warmest heart I've ever met in woman."

He held out his hand, and she put the money into it. He hesitated then, and looked at her; and perhaps because of some warning that flashed through her wet eyes, or perhaps because of some innate spring of good breeding in him, he only kissed the hand that had been strong to save him.

"Pray, what o'clock is it?" He struck his waistcoat, where a black ribbon made pretence for a missing watch. "My time piece has gone the way of most of my possessions."

"Tis past five," she said, "by the shadows."

The country girl had not forgotten her lore.

"Past five," cried he, "and I due at the Six Bells! If you will move a step, my dear, I will pick up my hat."

"Allow me, sir," said she. "Hats are my business."

She lifted the felt from the grass, dusted it with her arm, pushed out the dent where he had kicked it, and gave each corner a perfectly unnecessary twist.

"I'm in the millinery," said she, as she handed it to him.

"I thought there was something remarkably elegant about your headgear," he observed. "And pray oblige me with your address, that I may know where to return my loan, for the conviction grows in me that I am destined to win and to live."

She knew that sense of victory; it was akin to the conviction of her own confident soul; but while she smiled she pondered. Then she said demurely:

"My name is Pamela Pounce, sir. If you will inquire for me, care of my aunt, Miss Lydia Pounce, own woman to my Lady Kilcroney, 'twill be the safest address."

He gave her a quaint look, bowed profoundly, and hurried away.

"The safest address," he murmured, as he went. "Ah, Pamela, you're one of the wise virgins!"

Then he laughed.

"Farce did I call it? And I set for the blackest tragedy! Nay, 'tis a mighty delicate comedy, and we're but at the first act of it."

Pamela stood gazing after the retreating figure.

"Now," said she to herself. "I have the choice of three roads. I must go—to Bridewell, to the river, or to Aunt Lydia. It had better be to Aunt Lydia."

"Stripes and buttons," who had not forgotten how the younger Miss Pounce had snubbed him on their first meeting, informed her that she might "hunt up the old girl for herself," her ladyship having gone out her ladyship's woman, if not in her own apartment, might be found in her ladyship's chamber.

And here indeed, with a not altogether comfortably beating heart, Pamela confronted her aunt.

Lydia stared, as if beholding a ghost.

"La, whatever's to do?"

"The money's gone," said Pamela with great firmness.

She had made up her mind from the first that nothing should induce her to betray either the unfortunate young gentleman or her own rash interference with his concerns.

"Gone? Gone, miss?"

Pamela opened her reticule and mutely took out from it a vinaigrette, three pennies, a sixpence, and a pocket handkerchief, and showed the remaining vacuum to Lydia's horrified eyes.

"But how in the name of goodness could such a thing happen?"

"You lend me the money, aunt, and I'll pay you back faithful, and I'll trim you all your hats for three years for nothing into the bargain."

But with an action of little bony hands which typified her patronymic, Miss Pounce seized the reticule from her niece. She shook it, and tested it; she held it up to the light, she pulled its lining out. Then she tried the clasp, which fastened with a snap as uncompromising as that which now closed her own tight jaws.

Still, without speaking, she looked volumes at the milliner's assistant.

"I declare as I'm a living woman, aunt," asseverated the sinner, "that I have no more notion what's become of the gold than you have yourself. And all I can tell you is"—her courage rose with the sense of this perfect adherence to the truth—"that as I left this house it was have ready, papers about an inch larger in diameter than the glasses, brush the underside of the papers on the edge with mucilage or white of egg, then turn the paper down pressing it against the outside of the glass to which it will adhere, completely protecting the contents. Another method of sealing is to pour a layer of melted paraffin over the jelly when it is cold. If this method is used, be sure that the paraffin touches the edges of the glass all around. A coffee pot is a convenient utensil for melting and pouring the paraffin.

Storing Jellies. Jellies should be stored in a cool dark dry place. Bright light will cause them to fade in color and also to soften, leak out and spoil the label.

Essentials of Good Jelly are a good color, with a sparkling transparency, a texture that is neither syrupy, gummy, sticky, nor tough, firm enough to hold its shape and tender enough to cut easily with a spoon.

Many people hold the opinion that fresh made jelly is superior in flavor to that which has been kept for months. It is quite practical to make the juice ready for jelly and store it boiling hot (without sugar) in sterilized glass jars.

A commercial jelly-bag

Then when jelly is desired, it may be made ready for the table in a short time. By following this procedure, one may combine fruits that are in season at different times. One-third raspberry to two-thirds apple juice gives a jelly of strong raspberry flavor.

Jams. Whole fruits are used in making jams, but they do not remain whole. The finished product is alike throughout in consistency. As in jelly making, care must be given to the selection of the fruit. One-half of the quantity used should be slightly under-ripe to supply pectin and give the desired jelly-like consistency. Jam should be cooked rapidly in a porcelain lined or agate vessel and stirred frequently with a wooden spoon. A more delicate flavor will be retained by using three-quarters pound of sugar to one pound of fruit than by using equal proportions.

To Make Strawberry, Raspberry, or Blackberry Jam. For each pound of berries use three-fourths pound of sugar. Put the berries, carefully hulled, washed, and drained, in a porcelain lined or agate vessel. Place over the fire and let heat slowly, till they are softened throughout. Break up the berries with a wooden spoon, then add the sugar and let cook until thick. Pour at once into hot sterilized glasses. Seal as jelly.

Grape Jam. Remove grapes from stems; wash and press pulp from the skins. Boil the pulp until tender and

DON'T SQUEEZE BLACKHEADS

—DISSOLVE THEM

Squeezing and pinching out blackheads make the pores large and cause irritation—then, too after they have become hard you cannot get all of them out. Blackheads are caused by accumulations of dust and dirt and secretions from the skin and there is only one safe and sure way and one that never fails to get rid of them—a simple way, too—that is to dissolve them. Just get from any drug store about two ounces of Peroxine powder—sprinkle a little on a hot wet sponge—rub over the blackheads briskly for a few seconds—wash off and you'll be surprised to see that every blackhead has disappeared, and the skin will be left soft and the pores in their natural condition—anyone troubled with these unsightly blemishes should try this simple method. If your druggist is unable to supply you with Peroxine, send one dollar to the Fred W. Scarff Company, 424 Wellington Street West, Toronto, and they will send you enough Peroxine to last several weeks.

press it through a sieve to remove the seeds. Add the skins to the pulp and weigh. To each pound of fruit add three-fourths pound of sugar. Cook together until the skins are tender (fifteen to twenty minutes). Pack hot into sterilized jars and seal.

Peach Jam. Two pounds of peaches, one-half cup of peach juice, one cracked peach stone, one-half teaspoon allspice, one sprig mace, one pound sugar, two teaspoons bark cinnamon (broken in small pieces), one teaspoon cloves, one inch ginger-root. Tie spices in a cheese cloth bag. Cook all ingredients together for twenty minutes. Remove the spice bag. Pack hot in sterilized jars.

Apple Jelly. Wipe apples, remove stems but do not peel. Cut out any imperfect spots. Quarter and put in a porcelain lined or agate kettle. Barely cover with water and cook until tender. Mash and drain in a jelly bag. Measure the juice and to each cup of juice allow three-quarters of a cup of sugar. Let the juice boil twenty minutes, then add the sugar (heated) and boil until the jelly test is obtained. To vary this recipe, cook a thin slice of lemon or orange in the juice before the sugar is added, or delicately with green color paste. Pour into hot sterilized jars.

Spiced Crab Apple Jelly. Five pounds crab apples, one pint water, one pint vinegar, one teaspoon each whole cloves, mace blades, and cinnamon bark. Tie spices in a bag. Cook all ingredients together until the crab apples are soft. Drain and finish as apple jelly, using three-fourths cup of sugar to one cup of juice.

Five Fruit Jelly. Two quarts currants, one pint raspberries, one quart cherries, one quart strawberries, one pint apple juice. Stone the cherries. Heat all the fruit together in a double boiler, until the juice flows freely. Strain in jelly bag. Add the apple juice and let the combined juices boil about twenty minutes. Add one cup of sugar to each cup of juice and boil until jelly test is obtained.

Triple Fruit Jelly. Boil together until soft, four quinces, pared and cut small, one quart cranberries, and two quarts of apples cut in small pieces. Strain through a jelly bag over night. Measure the juice and boil about five minutes. Add one cup of sugar for each cup of just before turning into the glasses, add one teaspoon of vanilla or almond extract to each quart of juice, or hold a lemon or rose geranium leaf in the hot jelly for a few seconds.

Apple Mint Jelly. For a quart of apple juice set three cups of sugar in shallow dishes in the oven to heat. Place the crushed leaves and stalks from a bunch of mint in the juice and let it boil twenty minutes. Strain into a clean saucepan. Heat to the boiling point. Add the hot sugar and let boil till the jelly test is obtained. Tint juice and boil until jelling point is reached.

Currant Jelly. Remove the leaves, but not the stems, from currants and weigh the fruit. Mash the fruit in a porcelain lined kettle and heat gradually to boiling point. Let boil rapidly for twenty minutes, stirring frequently, to prevent burning. Drain through jelly bag. Heat juice to boiling point and let boil two minutes. Add one-half pound of sugar for each pound of fruit. Pour into glasses as soon as sugar is dissolved.

jingling in that bag, and when last I looked there wasn't one left. And if you don't come to my aid—why, you know what Madame Tabbishaw is? She'll always say I stole them. Come, you'll lend me the money, I know you will, for father's sake, and the name's sake. We Pounces ain't never been called thieves, aunt."

Her voice shook, for suddenly the word stung her, unrepentant though she remained.

"Lend you!" Miss Lydia let herself fall into my lady's own rosy-cushioned chair and broke into piercing remonstrance.

How in the name of goodness was she to find such a sum? Did Pamela think she was made of gold? Here was a return for all her kindness! A girl who was so wickedly careless—likely to keep her promises, indeed! She that ought to be racking her brains to pay back her dear auntie for all her sacrifices.

"Thirty pounds, miss, it cost me to send you to Paris, and you to be so unprincipled as to let Madame Eglantine's husband take to ogling you. And it's paying me back you ought to be, instead of having the brazenness to ask me for thirteen pounds. And indeed, miss, it's not thirteen pounds I'll give you; no, not a farthing more than the sum of the bill. You that might have had fourteen and tuppence!"

She suddenly broke off, sat up straight, and pointed a finger at her niece with a sharp throw.

"Where did you go to, miss, when you left this house? Straight, now! What? You went and sat under the trees in the park? Upon my word, I never! And how long might you have been a-sitting there? You don't know. Better and better. You went to sleep, miss, with that there bag full of gold. Oh, you—"

Pamela drooped her head, receiving the indictment as with the humility of a guilty conscience, though she was considerably relieved by the solution which the older Miss Pounce had found for herself.

Suddenly Lydia bounced out of her seat.

"Mercy on us, here's my Lady!" cried she. And then, with a scream: "Mercy on us!" she cried again. "What in the world has happened?"

Pamela stared. My Lady Kilcroney it was indeed, to judge by a fine feathered hat and a delicate flutter of muslins, but a vastly different Lady Kilcroney from the charming, happy little lady of Pamela's remembrance. A small figure with a stricken face crawled into the room, and as Lydia rushed forward, nearly swooned against her.

"My Lady, my Lady, what is it?" cried the maid in genuine concern, guiding her mistress's form to the chair she had herself but just vacated.

"Oh, oh, oh!" moaned my Lady. "Oh, in the name of Heaven, send for my Lord? Oh, Lydia, the letter, the letter!"

Both women then saw that in a little gloved hand my Lady Kilcroney was clutching an open sheet. Lydia took it into her own grasp and glanced at it.

"Mercy on us!" then cried she for the third time. "That dratted young man you've been so good to! Well, if ever was anything so ungrateful! To go and put an end to himself, just to spite you! Never you take on, my Lady, he's no great loss, I protest. A good riddance, say I."

"Oh, oh, oh!" Kitty Kilcroney sat up and wrung her hands. "Was ever any woman so punished for a fit of temper? Oh, Lydia! Oh! I shall never smile again! 'Twas my Lord being so late in yestereven from White's, mad-stupid with his losses. And, oh, the night I had, trying to show him the error of his ways and the vast folly of not letting bad be when the luck's against him. And him going off in a huff, God knows where, before I'd as much as swallowed my chocolate! And Mrs. Mirabel's hat coming on the top of it, and it is a sight to frighten the crows after all my trouble. And my gown for Her Majesty's birthday the wrong yellow, and no time to get another! And for the wretched boy to come to me then, with his horrid tale of the dice and the cards, as bad as my Lord's own, him without a farthing but my bounty! Oh, oh, 'twas true I insulted him! What's that you say? Who are you, pray?"

She had dropped her cries of anguish to speak with the irritability of the afflicted.

"I am your woman Lydia's niece."

Pamela went down on her knees before the little distracted lady, and spoke very gently and deliberately as to a child; and the while she spoke Kitty's eyes widened on her smiling countenance as if they beheld an angel's.

"Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs has not committed suicide, my Lady Kilcroney, nor will he do so, because I took the pistol out of his grasp. Yes, my Lady, I, with these hands. And I gave him the thirteen pounds you sent me to pay Mrs. Tabbishaw's bill. Thirteen pounds! And he went away to gamble with them at the 'Six Bells,' and he was quite sure that he was going to win all his money back from Lord Sanquhar with the help of them, and I am quite sure, too, for him. Says he 'My lady is turned.' And—"

She was interrupted.

"And that's what happened to my Lady's money. Oh, you deceitful wretch! Oh, you vile young thief!"

Lydia forgot everything but her indignation. Her gimlet tones might have disturbed the dead, but neither my Lady nor Pamela paid the smallest heed to her, for Kitty Kilcroney had flung herself upon the young milliner's neck, and, shedding tears of joy, called her the most incomparable girl, the noblest creature, the nearest thing to a seraph that had ever walked a world of woe.

They were both as keen of wit one as the other, and it was wonderful how, with scarce a question and answer, the whole story came out.

"You turned into the park, you did not know why? Ah, but I know why! 'Twas Providence, child. A most merciful act of Providence! And you saw his desperate face? Oh, I can scarce bear it! You wrenched the pistol from his very hand? Oh, if I live to be a hundred, how can I be grateful enough to Heaven and to you? Rash and unfortunate young man! You gave him thirteen pounds? He only asked me for ten. Oh, where did you say he had gone to? I must send after him. Lydia, bid the carriage round again. I must go myself. And you shall go with me, child. Oh, you shall indeed!"

"Since her Ladyship's in such a fine mood of generosity," cried Lydia, who occasionally presumed on fourteen years' service, "perhaps she'll pay Mrs. Tabbishaw's bill over again? Or else my niece will be getting into trouble, and she needn't look to me to get her out of it, lying to my very face!"

Kitty was standing before her mirror, happily setting her flounces into trim, like a ruffled bird its feathers.

"And why did you never tell me you had such a niece, Lydia, I should like to know? And what do you mean by burying a fine young woman like that with a creature like Tabbishaw? Ugh!"

My Lady's nerves were pardonably on edge. The shriek that escaped her as my Lord Kilcroney marched into the room was as piercing as Lydia's own.

"Good heavens, my Lord, you'll be the death of me! You should have married Susan Verney, you should indeed, or some one with a cast-iron constitution. Stay—"

Kitty's frowns were never of long duration, and she was in no mood for frowning! "You've come in the very nick of time, my dearest love. Do I not hear your coach without? Hasten, hasten to the tavern of the 'Six Bells.' Pray, where is it, my dear? Oh, doubtless you know, dearest Denis. And you will ask for Jocelyn Bellairs. You know, Denis, poor young Bellairs?"

"Faith, then, I've been beforehand with you, me darling!" said my Lord.

He was running Pamela's straight young figure up and down with the eye of the connoisseur as he stood there, a handsome, devil-may-care gentleman; one who patronised so superlative a tailor, wore such fine lawns and laces, and had withal so monstrous elegant a frame whereon to hang them that a trifle of a loop hanging here or a button loose there merely pointed to a genteel carelessness.

"Faith, I've been beforehand with you! Meeting my Lord Sanquhar anon, he took me to the 'Six Bells,' where he had a rendezvous with your poor young relative, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs. And be jabers," cried my Lord, with his favourite Irish oath, "if that young rascal hasn't cleaned both me and my Lord Sanquhar as bare as Mother Hubbard's cupboard."

He paused; the investigating eye fixed itself with a guilty twinkle upon his Kitty's countenance, where a mixture of strange emotions were struggling for expression. And suddenly Lydia clapped her hands and broke into eldritch laughter. Whereat my Lady also made her choice of emotions, and laughed too.

"And troth, mavourneen," said my Lord, delighted to find the situation so unexpectedly agreeable, "I'm here to say 'twas you were in the right of it the live-long night. There's not a ha'porth of good in trying to force fortune when the jade has made up her mind to flout ye. And I'll take your advice, me darling, and go with you into the country the moment we get those devils of IOU's settled, till it's time for you to abandon me for that dashed damnation Court of yours!"

"Oh, I can't scold you!" cried his wife. "But, oh, why did you abandon me all day? 'Twas cruel unkind of you, and I dare swear if you'd been here 'twould never have happened; for you'd not see a fellow dicer go wanting for a ten-pound note, my Lord, if I know you! Oh, read that letter, Denis, and you'll understand. And if it had not been for Lydia's niece here, admirable girl! who took the pistol out of his very hand in the park, and gave him her employer's money—oh, if it were not for this noble, clever young woman, where should I be now?"

"You needn't worry about the bill, aunt," said Pamela, with the perfect composure that compelled that person's disapproving admiration. "I gave your address to Mr. Bellairs, and as he will certainly be punctual with repayment, her Ladyship will perhaps kindly allow me to remain until he calls with the money?"

There was nothing my Lady Kilcrome would have refused Miss Pounce the younger at that moment, and the milliner's assistant proceeded to add to her obligations.

"If your Ladyship would trust me with the retrimming of Miss Mirabel's hat meanwhile, I make bold to say I could alter it to your satisfaction —" be the admission of a fear of death, for these men who constantly face it never mention this word when they begin to feel its nearness. Refreshed by the rest and the food he made fifteen miles that night and at daybreak next morning was again on the trail. A day and a half later he found Shorty lying under a sage bush. He was unconscious, but still breathing, and laying aside his gun and pack he managed to hoist him onto his own broad back and with his burden he struggled on.

The stage was recently in and the Mining Recorder was reading his morning's mail when a large and haggard man with bloodshot eyes, bearing an inert form on his back stumbled against the counter and dropped his burden amongst the books and papers.

"What the —" began the Mining Recorder, and then stopped.

"Look after the little fellow" said the haggard man, "and make out these papers quick."

While willing hands administered restoratives to Shorty, and the Mining Recorder made out the papers the big man hung across the counter holding himself on by its far edge.

"What name shall I put in this other claim?" asked the Recorder.

Without letting go his hold on the edge of the counter the big man called out. "What's your name, Shorty?"

"Bill McLeod" came the feeble answer from the revived Shorty.

"Put that in," he said. "William McLeod" and then seeing the Mining Recorder write in the big book and lay down his pen he asked:

"Are they registered: both of them?"

"Yep," said the Recorder. "All in order."

Then the powerful hands relaxed and Big Gab Billings slid to the floor in a heap.

THE ROOF-TREE

THERE are classes of men to whom nothing is lacking of what goes to make up the external trappings of a residence. Civilization has heaped their hands with treasure, given them comfort, room, peace, everything necessary to the setting up of this material home. But they possess it only to desert it. Parents and children go each his own way, and the family dissolves.

Elsewhere the contrary happens. "I know a bridge in Paris," says Charles Wagner, "where every day you may find a woman selling soup at two sous a plate. Her stand consists of three or four planks and an umbrella like awning, and it would be hard to imagine a less convenient place for a family reunion. No matter! Under this precarious shelter, open to all the winds of heaven, there gather every evening, round a smoky torch, all the children, some of them studying their lessons, and the father, resting after the toil of the day. These people have the spirit of family, and that is the essential thing. This spirit it is that must be saved, nourished, strengthened; and it is tenacious, strikes root in the most ungrateful soil."

Yet Puffed Grains were not made for tidbits. Prof. Anderson created them as scientific grain foods.

In every grain we create over 100 million steam explosions—one for every food cell. Thus every granule in the whole grain is fitted to digest.

The nut-like flavor comes from fearful heat. The airy texture comes from these explosions.

Mix with berries to double their delights

The result is a whole grain made wholly digestible. Every atom feeds.

Serve all day long in summer

With melted butter for afternoon confections

There is nothing you would rather have children eat than whole wheat and whole rice. Here they are made enticing and easy to digest.

Then serve them morning, noon and night, in every way you can. Keep both kinds on hand, and in plenty.

Puffed Wheat

Wheat Tidbits

Air, flimsy—8 times normal size

Whole wheat supplies 16 needed elements. It is rich in iron, in lime, in phosphates. With milk it forms a practically complete food—the greatest food you can serve.

Puffed Wheat makes whole wheat tempting. With every food cell blasted, all those 16 elements nourish.

Let every child, at least twice daily, eat Puffed Wheat in milk.

Housecleaning

Old Dutch Cleanser

economical

Give Old Dutch the run of the house. From cellar to garret, from garage to front porch, the job will be cleaned up quickly with a saving of time, money and energy.

Old Dutch is a natural-born cleanser—a fine, flaky substance mined out of the earth. It contains no hard, sharp grit and doesn't scratch.

Its soft, flat flakes erase the dirt instead of scratching at it as grit does. The surface is left smooth and bright. No dirt is ground in. The things you clean are cleaner and last longer.

Use it today; use it every day—for every cleaning job.

Old Dutch removes the dirt—not the surface

Pretty Girls Have Always Known the Secret

These two pretty girls share the same beauty secret, although one lived 3,000 years ago. Girls who both know that a fresh, smooth, radiant skin is not only woman's greatest charm, but one within the reach of every woman.

For pretty girls used a form of Palmolive in the days of ancient Egypt, just as they do today. The crude combination of palm and olive oils, which served as a beautifying cleanser, was the inspiration of the familiar Palmolive cake, famous for its mildness the world over.

Modern science with all its progress, can find no milder, more soothing cleansers than these two ancient oils. It can only perfect their combination and offer it in the most efficient and convenient form.

Gives a Perfect Skin

To state that just washing your face every day will give you that all-desired, fresh, smooth skin may sound too simple to be true. But such cleanliness is the foundation of complexion beauty, for this reason.

The accumulations of dirt, oil and perspiration, cold cream and powder must be removed or they will collect and clog the tiny pores which compose the surface of the skin. Such clogging enlarges the pores, which soon results in coarse texture, and the imbedded dirt causes blackheads, and when it carries infection, eruptions follow. There is no beauty in such a neglected skin, which repels when it should attract, and prevents popularity and social success.

Soothes while it Cleanses

Some women will complain that soap is too harsh, that it ages and dries their skins. This proves they are using the wrong soap.

The smooth, creamy lather of Palmolive soothes while it cleanses. It removes every trace of injurious dirt and skin accumulations and secretions, leaving the face becomingly soft and smooth, with radiant freshness and natural color.

The use of cosmetics isn't harmful if the basis is a skin that is thoroughly, healthfully clean. In case of dryness, apply your favorite cold cream both before and after washing.

Not Only for Faces

Don't forget that your neck and throat are also conspicuous for skin beauty or the lack of it, and that this is where age first shows.

Arms and shoulders should be kept smooth and white and hands must be beautified.

Use Palmolive for bathing and these results are insured, with the comfort of a skin which always feels luxuriously smooth.

Not Extravagant at the Price

If Palmolive was a very expensive soap, such advice would mean extravagance. But the firm, long-wearing cake of generous size costs only ten cents.

The reason is gigantic production which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night and the importation of the bland, mild oils in vast volume which reduces cost.

Thus this finest facial soap, which if made in small quantities would cost at least 25 cents, is offered at the popular price which all can afford for every toilet purpose.

THE making of boats is an ancient craft—and the old workman photographed at Pierreville is busy on small birch bark canoes—such as will delight the boy who has a yearning to sail the river and the lake some day. The photograph, reproduced on this page, shows a worker of old Quebec province, who is a thorough master of his craft and knows what is the correct thing in canoes. By the way, if Canadians wish to see handicrafts at their best, they must turn to the East and watch the weavers of Quebec and the Maritime Provinces, as they turn out the homespun and basketry. It is true that there are homespun in the West, but they are chiefly the work of the newcomers; while Quebec, for many generations, has known its sons of the soil and daughters of the loom. This old maker of toy canoes is typical of the community in which nearly everyone works.

Our new serial, "Pamela Pounce," is now well on its way and the adventures which are befalling that handsome court milliner are enough to make the fortune of a movie star. Pamela is a young person of ambition, with a genius for hats, and some day, we are sure, she will "arrive." The well-known writers of romance, Agnes and Egerton Castle, have not given us anything more piquant than Pamela.

The French Canadian life, with its touch of adventure and its picturesque contrasts, affords a background to Mabel L. Stuart's "The Honor of the North," which is charmingly illustrated by Mary Essex. Another attractive fiction feature is "A Thanksgiving with Accidentals" by Edward Moore, illustrated by Marion Long. The heroine is a most plucky and self-reliant young person and we hope her next Thanksgiving will have no accidentals, but run a smooth course homeward to a good old-fashioned dinner.

Every woman, who has known a housewife's woes will appreciate the struggle of the heroine of "The Little House," whom Olive Delahaye tells about and who finally attains the desire of her heart. Men are a success, perhaps, as architects, and contractors, and, as real estate dealers, many of them achieve fame and fortune; but few of them understand what a woman really wants in a home of her own. It is well-nigh impossible to make a man understand just what a woman likes in her dwelling-place, and, no doubt the man will declare that a woman does not know her own mind concerning a house. She does—for all that—and especially does she know her own heart when it comes to a question of the roof-tree and the rooms beneath it. The mistress of "The Little House" belongs to a large sisterhood, and we know that many of our readers will enjoy the story of how she becomes a charming hostess in the house of her choice.

We seem to have chosen "house" stories for October—and there is another one, "How Malvina Learned to Play House," which is a touching tale of a woman who had all work and no play until she resolved to change the course of her toilsome life. We are afraid that these stories do not exhibit the husband as an entirely admirable creature; but man has had the house too much his own way through many years, and it is time to show how very important it is to woman to have a desirable habitation.

Of course you have noticed how many of our most comfortable citizens have "year-round porches." They are an outcome of our realization that sunlight is necessary to health and fitness—and where will you get more and pleasanter sunlight than in an out-door porch? There is the coal problem, of course, this winter—and goodness only knows where the next ton is coming from and how long it will last. Still, it will only make us colder to worry over it, and we are quite confident that the Government, the Province and the Municipality united will manage not to let us shiver to death this winter. So, let us consider the "year-round porch," its furniture and its ferns, and try to understand how much it would add to the joy of living if we only had a porch shut in from all the stormy winds which blow. Mr. Collier Stevenson tells us, in this month's issue, just how pleasant and comforting the indoor porch can be and shows us, by means of photographs, how to have a picturesque apartment.

Miss Long, who is one of our best-known illustrators, has written for us an article on the important subject of pictures for the child's room. We are sure that you will be interested in what she has to say on this matter, for it is only by the choice of what is finest that the child's taste can be turned to the true and noble in art.

We have received many kind messages of late concerning the covers which our magazine wears. That of August by Mr. Ahrens was artistically a woodland gem, and we hope to have another cover design by this artist on our list for 1923. The design this month is by Miss Emily Hand, who has given us a wonderful witch for the month of Hallowe'en, with the traditional broomstick and the fiercest cat that ever walked on the last night of October.

For November there is a cover which crossed the seas to find a friendly harbor in our office; and, when you see how pretty the girl is, you will not wonder that the cover design found a happy home. It is not easy to find the suitable design for an outside page, and, so far, the magazine has been almost strictly Canadian in the coat which it wears.

The apple may have been the forbidden fruit which brought all our troubles upon us, when our first parents were evicted from Eden, and which started humanity on its chase from one country to another. Read! "Many Uses for the Apple" in our October issue and you will be convinced that the Canadian apple, as served in sauce or deep pie, is a continual blessing.

From a recent letter:

"I, as a mother strongly recommend Fels-Naptha for all babies' things. It gets out all stains so easily—often without boiling. The clothes do not irritate Baby's tender skin."

What is his health worth?

Doctors agree clean clothes have almost as much to do with Baby's health as the quality of his food; or the temperature of his bath. By "clean clothes" is meant clothes that not only look clean, but which are clean, through and through each tiny thread. Fels-Naptha cleans clothes that way!

The naptha loosens all dirt and stains for the sudsy water to flush away, then vanishes completely—leaving the little baby-things fluffy, soft and soothing, with that clean-clothes smell. Fels-Naptha does all laundry work just as quickly, safely, thoroughly and hygienically. Directions inside the wrapper.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners—a way that has never been successfully imitated! Wet the clothes, soap them, roll and soak them, rub the extra-soiled parts, then rinse. It's just that easy.

A full-color art print, 8 x 14 inches, of this beautiful baby picture, free from advertising and suitable for framing, will be sent with a sample of Fels-Naptha for ten cents in stamps, to cover cost of mailing. Write Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

FELS-NAPTHA

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

THE frost-bound river wound in a wide white streamer through the eery silence of the forest, now a broad highway glittering with countless diamond-stars, now plunged into sombre blackness where pines and balsams threw a murky shadow from bank to bank.

In Blondeau all was peace and sweet tranquillity. Lights twinkled from snow-laden cottages and the tinted windows of the chapel on the hillside shot beams of gold and crimson across the wastes of snow.

On the outskirts of the village where the black mass of forest cut sharply into the clearing, stood a dwelling more pretentious than the rest. Every window was ablaze with light. From the half-open door came the sound of shrill music—Gaston's fiddle scraping and sawing with unflagging zeal to the accompaniment of ringing laughter and the stamp of dancing feet. Madame Tascheraud was entertaining in honor of her charming niece, and Madame's dances were famous through all Quebec.

As the young people whirled about in gay abandonment one figure seemed to stand out clearly from the throng—a tall, slight girl with sad blue eyes and a wealth of gold-bronze hair. In the yellow glare of the lamp-light her delicate loveliness and simple gown contrasted strongly with the exotic beauty of Blondeau's black-eyed belles. "A sweet pansy in a basket of tulips," murmured Madame Tascheraud gazing adoringly at her niece.

Madelaine Tascheraud was apparently enjoying herself. Between dances she was surrounded by a circle of stalwart woodsmen. She was the perfect partner, light and graceful and vivacious, and yet, withal, there was something about her that kept her admirers at a respectful distance. Her blue eyes seemed to look sweetly and calmly right through into one's soul in an uncanny and disconcerting way. That glance had chilled more than one turbulent wooer and left him wondering dazedly why his bold declaration had remained unspoken.

One face was missing from this annual festival—the one face that mattered to Madelaine. She and Gaspard Duval had been playmates and comrades since the days of pinafores and pigtailed. Big, handsome, teasing Gaspard, famous hunter and expert trapper, the neatest shot and the best scholar in all the countryside, it was small wonder that he was worshipped as a demi-god by the fascinated femininity of Blondeau.

Madelaine had never imagined life without him. Everyone knew of his devotion to his old playmate. It seemed an ideal match, and yet there had never been an understanding. Gaspard liked to have his fling; he wanted to be free. Some day he would settle down with Madelaine in the green and white cottage behind the ivy-grown stone wall, but not yet.

It was only last Autumn that Madelaine's dreams had been dispelled. A serpent had entered her little Eden in the form of the doctor's niece from Chateaugay. Jeanne Duclos was an undoubted beauty and wiser than the serpent that she seemed to poor Madelaine. In a week Blondeau to a man was at her feet, with Gaspard, not to be outdone when so thrilling a contest was afoot, leading the circle of moths that beat about the enchanting flame.

And it had been on Gaspard that Jeanne finally bestowed her favor quite regardless of her engagement to Paul Olier, a trapper of Blondeau, whose absence in the western States had left her at liberty to weave her fascinating meshes around other victims. Gaspard's popularity and magnetic charm, but more probably his comfortable home and fat bank account had weighed heavily with practical Jeanne. With dismay Madelaine had watched him drawn into the net. She had even stood in stony silence and watched him wedded to the butterfly from Chateaugay.

When the trapping season had opened and the men left for their hunting-grounds in the northern forests Jeanne had decided to accompany Gaspard. Neither prayers, threats nor persuasions could dissuade her. Her lungs had never been strong; she wanted a winter in the woods, and she meant to go. Gaspard who knew only too well the rigours of those winter months, alternately raged and pleaded but was finally compelled to yield to her obstinacy.

All these painful memories had been surging through Madelaine's brain as she danced with flaming cheeks and careless manner. But as the evening wore away the strain began to tell. She felt that she must be alone even for a few moments, and watching her opportunity she slipped from the heated room and disappeared into a tiny bedroom off the kitchen, the abode of big Marie Robichaud who helped with the house-work and ruled the household. Here she was safe from intrusion, and seating herself by the window in the soothing darkness she leaned her cheeks on her palms and gazed out into the frosty starlight.

She had only been there a moment when voices outside caught her attention. At first she heard them dreamily, then as

On his way to Madame Tascheraud's that very evening he had run across Jacques, also bound for the hospitable home where all were welcome. Paul was too full of his injuries and his schemes to enter the house without unburdening his soul, so the two had retreated to the shelter of the trees behind the house to discuss the subject without danger of interruption.

They were in the midst of their conversation when Madelaine had overheard the few words that had stricken her with horror. Paul's curses and threats of vengeance drove the blood from her cheeks. She listened breathlessly as Jacques' clear-cut, mocking tones roused his companion to further violence.

"Are you a coward, Marquette?" snarled Paul, his voice hoarse with fury. "We pass near the place on the way to aine felt that his bold eyes were reading her very soul.

Ever since that day seven years ago when Jacques had saved her life in the Blondeau Rapids, he had haunted her with dogged persistence. Only once in all those years had he spoken of his love and then so vehemently and violently that the girl had been terrified, and shudderingly rejected his advances. "Then it is Gaspard," he had taunted, his lips curving into a cruel smile that Madelaine detested. "The women make too much of Gaspard. He will go beyond Blondeau for a wife." And Madelaine had trembled at the murderous flash of his eyes.

And now Jacques was home, debonair and smiling, his prophecy fulfilled and his manner triumphant. He pierced Madelaine's flimsy veil of gaiety at a glance. He read the heart-break and the struggle to rise above her sorrow, and he admired her spirit and her bravery. His smouldering hatred of Gaspard burst into fierce, revengful flame. He would join Paul Olier on his mission of vengeance against this man who had scorned what he had coveted.

As Jacques swept Madelaine into the dance her thoughts were in a turmoil. For one dreadful moment she had been almost glad when Paul Olier had uttered his threats, then a bitter self-loathing had swept over her. She must outwit these plotters. Gaspard must be saved. A dozen mad plans sprang to life and were rejected. Whatever she did must be done quickly; men of the temper of these two were not apt to delay. She must be alone to think.

It was an hour later that a cloaked figure stole from the back of Madame Tascheraud's house and slipped through the church-yard to the shelter of the chapel. Candles were burning fitfully in their quaint, brass candle-sticks and the white Christ hung, pale and tragic, in the dimness beyond the altar. As Madelaine knelt in a halo of moonbeams where peaceful saints smiled down on her from gilded frames, a deep peace enveloped her. Her mind grew clear; the light of a great resolve shone from her eyes. She would go herself up the long white trail into the wilderness—her life for his if need be, the sacrifice of the "greater love."

Before the first faint pink of sunrise had flooded the misty hills beyond the river she was on her way, with Bijou, the big wolf-hound close at her heels. A trapper's daughter, inured from infancy to the hardships of life in the wilds, she was absolutely without fear. Her only confidante in her perilous undertaking was Madame Tascheraud, and that hard-headed, secretive person had entered eagerly into the spirit of her adventure, had helped her to prepare and accompanied her some distance on the way before giving her a farewell embrace and calling down the blessing of "Le Bon Dieu" and countless saints upon her.

Madelaine swung with easy grace across the powdery snow that blew in fine spray before her snow-shoes. The crimson globe in the eastern sky had revealed a land enchanted. The network of feathery branches overhead was festooned with glittering icedrops, each a tiny delicate-tinted mirror reflecting the glory of sunrise. A fox peered stealthily from the underbrush, only to be driven hastily to cover by Bijou's frantic rush: a jay piped saucily from a swinging bough; a rabbit looped across the trail. The girl's heart ached with a passionate adoration of it all.

THIS daughter of the wilderness knew the trail step for step—where it climbed the rocky ridges from which you caught a view as fair as Paradise itself, where it plunged into a shadowy ravine in whose depths the flaunting daylight was mellowed to a soft grey dusk. The perils of the way she knew right well, but the rifle on her shoulder was a trusted friend, and "Le Bon Dieu"—he would protect.

Madelaine could never give a clear account of that journey—where she made her camp-fire, where she ate and slept, or if she slept at all. She was driven on by the fear of being overtaken, for her trail was easy to follow and tho' she had a fair start expert woodsmen like the two conspirators might easily come up with her in a very short time.

She had never dreamed the cynical face could grow so gentle. His love for Madelaine was at least sincere.

their significance dawned upon her she started back hurriedly behind the muslin curtains straining every sense to catch the low tones so close below her. It was the trapper, Paul Olier. He had returned that day from his absence in the west and with him was the man whom Madelaine feared more than anything on earth—bold, daredevil Jacques Marquette.

Everyone knew that Paul was to have married Jeanne Duclos on his return from his western trip but that was nothing to the fickle Jeanne. She had taken a younger and wealthier husband without the slightest hesitation. Paul would just have to get over it. But she had reckoned without his fiery, revengful temper. As soon as the news reached him he had determined to square accounts with Gaspard and Jeanne. He would finish out his time in the west, but none the less he meant to be avenged.

ON the return journey he had been joined by Jacques Marquette, the happy-go-lucky fur-trader of Blondeau. Jacques was intensely interested in his tale. His cutting, sarcastic comments added fuel to Paul's bitterness and when the latter arrived at Blondeau and heard full particulars from the keeper of the "Golden Lion," he could scarcely contain his rage. Plans innumerable seethed in his brain. He would get Jacques to go in on this; Jacques had a grudge of his own against Gaspard—so much he had gathered from his non-committal comrade.

my trapping-grounds. A day or two up the long trail, then a puff of smoke, a handful of ashes, and the dead—they tell no tales.

"Quietly, you imbecile," cautioned the other, glancing suspiciously around. "This is no place for such talk. Come and dance now. To-morrow we can make plans."

Madelaine heard their footsteps crunching around to the front door where, a moment later, they were boisterously greeted by the youth and beauty of Blondeau and Madame Tascheraud, their beaming hostess.

Madelaine had fled from her retreat back to the long, low, dark-ceiled room where the dance was in progress, arriving before the newcomers had reached the door. When they entered she was once more the centre of an animated group.

The taller and slighter of the two was evidently the favorite, for nonchalant, adventurous Jacques, the man of champagne temperament, was popular in Blondeau despite his occasional bouts of drinking and smashing up things in general. He stood lazily in the doorway, his sharp, black eyes searching the moving crowd. When his glance encountered Madelaine's, his small white teeth showed for a moment between thin lips, then his face resumed its expression of studied indifference. With gliding, cat-like grace he shouldered his way to her side and bent low over her extended hand.

"What, not first at the door to greet an old comrade!" he laughed, and Madel-

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

Lady Kilcroney (formerly known as the fascinating widow, Kitty Bellairs), secures an appointment as Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. This arouses the jealousy of Mrs. Lafone, who tries to injure Kitty, when a friend of the latter, Lady Mandeville, who had been guilty of a youthful folly, appears on the scene. Kitty's loyalty to her repentant friend triumphs, and Queen Charlotte greets her graciously. In the meantime, Lydia Pounce, Lady Kilcroney's own maid, is dismayed by the appearance of her niece, Pamela Pounce, upon the scene. Pamela has been dismissed from the milliner's shop of Madame Eglantine in Paris, because the latter's husband has tried to thrust unwelcome attentions upon her. Pamela enters the service of Mrs. Tabbishaw in London, and, in the course of her duties, comes upon young Jocelyn Bellairs, the nephew of Lady Kilcroney's first husband, who is about to commit suicide in the park. Pamela snatches the pistol, and, to save Jocelyn's honor, gives him the money which Lydia had handed to her to pay Lady Kilcroney's bill with Mrs. Tabbishaw. Kitty, who has been distracted about Jocelyn's threats, is delighted when she finds what Pamela has done and straightway takes her into favor.

SHOWING STORM WITHIN AND WITHOUT

THERE are some who seem to be destined always to keep on top as the wheel of life revolves; no matter how others may suffer from the law of its relentless motion.

My Lady Kilcroney (still in the minds of those who had first known her in her brilliant widowhood "Incomparable Bellairs!") might be counted among the rare ones who are thus miraculously favoured.

Beauty, wit, charm, wealth, rank and the irresistible dash of the born leader she had already possessed; now she had attained to Court favour: she was Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Charlotte! It is scarcely necessary to add that she had become a power in the world; should she choose to exercise her influence on behalf of anyone clever and virtuous enough to profit of it, that person's fortune might be regarded as safe.

So do great planets, following their allotted orbits, carry in their wake lesser stars that bask and shine in a reflected light!

In the instance of Miss Pamela Pounce the luminary thus lifted into prominence, possessed a very considerable power of shining on her own account; and, once her position in the hemisphere assured, she required no borrowed brilliancy.

In other words, my Lady Kilcroney's recommendation obtained for Pamela Pounce a new start in life. Madame Mirabel, exceedingly dissatisfied with her head milliner, aware that Madame Eglantine of Paris was growing sleek on the very cream of her rightful British custom, and being moreover much struck with Pamela's genteel appearance, her manner and her aptitude, was all readiness to oblige so distinguished a client as my Lady Kilcroney, and give the young woman a trial.

Before the autumn of her disastrous summer had waned, the younger Miss Pounce found herself firmly established in the very position which had been the object of her wildest dream. She was head of the millinery department of the great Bond Street mantua maker.

Like her unexpected patroness, it might seem that her cup of happiness was full. But there is no factor in the calculations of existence so easily forgotten as that most important item of all: the human heart.

Pamela, in making her courageous plan of life, had forgotten to reckon with her heart!

And this tiresome, irresponsible, uncontrollable organ began to trouble her exceedingly. In those hours of leisure when she was not concocting delightful schemes for the breaking of other people's hearts—for every one knows what a killing hat will do—she found herself considerably inconvenienced by the peculiar conduct of her own.

Said Miss Polly Popple, of the millinery department, to Miss Clara Smithson, the book-keeper:

"You mark my words, my dear, there's something up with that young woman Pounce! She'll be getting herself into a regular scandal with that dashing young spark of hers! And if she ain't got something on her conscience already ... I don't know the signs!"

Miss Smithson leant forward, wheezing heavily.

"Providence ain't always unjust, Polly," she said, "and people do come by their rights, no matter how many vicissitudes is against them!"

"Ah," said Polly, swelling her fine bust, and looking at herself in the fly-blown glass which hung over the chimney in the little room at the back of the Bond Street shop where she was sitting, after hours, with her friend. "That was a bit of jobbery, that was! There isn't one in the establishment, I do believe, that wasn't struck all of a heap when they heard that a strange young female was put into old Mrs. Dodder's place instead of me, which the next in rank is always, by law, you might say, entitled to. Lady Kilcroney being that prodigious in the fashion—not that I was ever one to admire her; give me breeding!—and Madame Mirabel being so set on cutting out Madame Eglantine—not that she ever will, and you mark my words, for London ain't Paris, I say, and that I'll maintain, and you may talk yourself blue in the face, Clara, and you won't alter that! If it hadn't been for that put-up job, 'tis I'd have been head of the millinery here this moment."

Miss Polly Popple's case was clear, but Miss Smithson's reasons for disliking Pamela were perhaps more abstruse. She talked big of the claims of friendship, of her sympathy for Miss Popple, and also of a "rising within her," which with her was an infallible sign of "something fishy" in somebody else. But the truth was that the new-comer's radiant youth, her success, her spirit of enterprise, had started the base passion of envy in Miss Smithson's withered breast; a passion the more prejudicial that it flourishes entirely outside the pale of reason! She listened very greedily, therefore, to Miss Popple's rapid exposition of her suspicious. Between gossip, malice, and inventiveness, the new milliner's character seemed indeed in a parlous condition when Miss Popple concluded.

That wheezing breath of Miss Smithson's was drawn with ever-increased intensity.

"Walking with the young gentleman late of an evening in the Green Park! Upon my word! If it had been you that had seen her last night, now, Miss Popple dear, instead of that poor foundling of a Mary Jane, which Madame Mirabel was saying only yesterday could scarce be trusted to match a skein of blue silk, I'd go to Madame Mirabel this minute with it. I would, being so to speak, a cousin—"

"Beware what you does, Miss Smithson, you'll ruin all. Give her rope."

"Rope, Miss Popple?"

"Rope to hang herself with," said Miss Popple vindictively. "That's in a manner of speaking. Plain, she'll give herself away or he'll give her away," she had an ill-natured giggle, "so as we give them time. It's his game to give her away, a devil-may-care handsome young buck who only wants to have her at his mercy, just for his fun. Wasn't he after her here—open—three afternoons out of last week?"

"After her here?" Miss Smithson again repeated her friend's last words. She was exceedingly shocked.

"Why, mercy to goodness," she went on in horrified tones: "Ain't it the rule of the house? No male belongings is allowed after the young ladies here if they were grandfathers itself. And they church-wardens."

"Oh, tush, Smithson," interrupted Polly contemptuously. "Of course my sly young beau comes dangling in with some lady friend, to help her to choose a hat—by way of—" Polly winked. "Toos-day, it was Mrs. Lafone as brought him, or, to be correct, he brought her, which, knowing the minx as I do—I refers here to Mrs. Lafone—'tis my intimate conviction 'tis he will pay for that there hat! But, as you knows, Miss Smithson, and none better, ladies' morals ain't our concern, thanks be, so long as we keeps our own respectable."

Miss Smithson admitted this regrettable truth with a doleful sigh. Polly took another pull at the brew of hot spiced beer which they had concocted for their comfort this cold December night, and proceeded:

"Thursday, if Mr. Stafford doesn't bring him along all innocent! He, with his handsome lady on his arm, up from Windsor for the day, to buy her a stylish head for a Christmas present. And, 'What are you doing, looking in at a hat-shop window, Bellairs,' says he, laughing and joking ('tis his way, my dear, a very agreeable gentleman!) 'Gad,' says he, 'you've not got a wife to run you up bills! Your chinkers goes hopping out on hosses and dice and cards, and what not! Selfish fellows you bachelors are!' And Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, bowing to Mr. Stafford and declaring he only wished he had other people's luck—and indeed, Miss Smithson, Mrs. Stafford is a real beauty!—but all the while, my dear, who is he looking at and ogling and taking occasion to whisper to—but Miss Pounce, if you please! And if I didn't see the way her kerchief lace was quivering with the palpitation of her heart, and her hands shaking as she took down heads for Mrs. Stafford and held them up for her—well, my name's not Popple."

Miss Smithson leant over the sulky coal fire and lifted the saucepan from the hob to refill her glass. Her own hands shook. That Pamela was a disgrace and would bring discredit on the whole house of Mirabel! She felt it in her bones.

"You may say so, dear." As her friend drank, Polly Popple tendered her own tumbler for replenishment, murmuring parenthetically, however: ("Not a drop more, love. I never did hold with stimulants, only you were so pressing and it is a foggy night, I won't deny, and a drop of cordial, a mere medical precaution, so to speak)—you may say so, the slighted young lady of the bonnet department took up her theme with fresh gusto. "And you'd say so a million times more if you had seen them to-day. For Mr. Jocelyn comes in with my Lady Kilcroney—and oh! the bold brazenness of it!—there he stands behind my Lady's chair and Pounce—La! I declare I'd have been sorry for her if she wasn't what she is, the baggage—red and white and not knowing where to put her eyes with him signalling to her. Yes, and if he did not thrust a letter into her hand as I went out, you may set me down a liar. And her stuffing it into her kerchief under my very nose!"

"Don't, dear, don't," moaned Miss Smithson, beating the air with her bony hand. Then, after a long pause, during which she seemed to be painfully bringing her virginal mind to confront the awful pictures just presented to it, she went on acridly: "There'll be a bust up. When a girl comes to that pint of disreputableness things is bound to happen. It can't go on like this—you mark my words."

Now, strangely enough, barring the inexactitude of the premise, such a conclusion had just formed itself in Pamela's own mind.

It could not go on. Something was bound to happen. She had saved the life of Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs; and he had demonstrated his gratitude by promptly falling head over heels in love with her. So far, so good; or rather, so far, so bad, where a dashing young gentleman of expensive habits, small principle and remarkable fascination and a young person of the working classes are concerned. For the mischief of it was she had fallen in love with him. Poor Pamela, with her high spirit, her clear brain and her strong courage, to be betrayed by a heart as vulnerable as any silly girl's of the lot! She was clear-sighted enough to know that, stripped of the golden glamour, the path of her romance led to a very ugly gulf. She despised herself for her weakness. She had no illusions on the quality of the attachment offered to her by Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, but, as the short December day dropped away to Christmas, she found growing within her, a dangerous new self a reckless creature who cried: The Devil might take the consequences, a girl was young but once; you found your fate, and had to clasp him or lose him, the one man you could love, and him only, or go wanting to your grave!

"I know it's death and destruction some time," said Pamela to herself, sitting hugging her knees in the neat little chamber in Shepherd Street, where she lodged with a most respectable widow woman who had once seen better times.

His glance flickered over the comely proportions. Tall, generously made, he called her a nymph. "Goddess would have been a better appellation," murmured he.

"but isn't it death and destruction anyhow and at once if I have to give him up?"

She re-read the letter he had slipped into her hand—the audacious fellow—a few hours ago at Madame Mirabel's.

"It must be yes or no, my darling lovely girl."

My darling, lovely girl. That was what his eyes were always saying, and oh! it was sweet!

It must be yes or no! She told herself that if she couldn't say yes, it was still more impossible to say no. Backwards and forwards she struggled with the insoluble problem, till her tallow candle expired with a great stench, and she was left in darkness and misery. Worn out with her long day she fell at last asleep, to be awakened by the call of a cock in Shepherd's Market. Perhaps it was this farmyard cry which, weaving into her consciousness, had made her dream so strongly of the old place at home. When she woke she could hardly believe she was not in the billowing four-poster in the great attic, with pretty Sister Susie asleep beside her.

Again the cold, foggy, bleak London morning was rent by the crow of the cock. Then Pamela knew where she was, and she knew something else, too.

That other self which had got into her must not be listened to on any account. It must indeed be stamped out of existence with the utmost promptitude.

Now Pamela was considerably wiser than most young women in her position. She took a sensible resolution.

"I'll go to Mrs. Mirabel this very morning," she decided, "and ask for a Christmas holiday. She won't refuse me, being the good-natured soul she is, and me so useful to her. And once I get home and feel mother's arms about me—there! I know I'll be all right. I needn't be afraid of myself any more."

Pamela Pounce took seat in the Dover coach. She was in a sedate flutter, an admirably dignified bustle. She knew to the fraction of an inch the amount of space to which she was entitled, and she possessed herself of it determinedly. She had, besides her own agreeable person, divers bandboxes and loose parcels to place, and this she did with an amiable assurance that put protest to the blush, and set other passengers' pretensions in a gross light. When her arrangements were concluded she heaved a sigh, presented a vague smile, and lay back, her hands folded, to survey the other travellers at leisure. She was herself better worth looking at than any of the coach-load, which contained a foreign couple, one or two of the usual bagmen on the road to France, a Dover shopkeeper, a farmer's wife, and an elderly gentleman of delicate and serious mien, who drew an old calf-bound volume from a shabby bag, and fixed large goldmounted spectacles upon his high, transparent nose with all the air of one prepared with solace for the journey.

But as he sat exactly opposite Miss Pamela Pounce, his shrewd, cold eyes wandered ever and anon from the point to fix itself upon her, as though—which was indeed the fact—he were puzzled in what category to place her. It was obvious to Sir Edward Chevalier, who, though impoverished, was himself a gentleman of the first water, that the ambulant nymph in front of him was not of his class, perfect as was the fit of her grey riding-coat, refined and reposeful as were the hands in their long grey gloves, tasteful in its coquettishness as was the grey riding toque, set on chestnut curls, and suitably as these curling tresses, unpowdered, were smoothed away to be tied with a wide black ribbon at the back of the long proud throat.

In the first instance, no young person of family with such claims to distinction as her elaborate travelling gear pointed to, would be voyaging in the public coach unattended; in the second, in her quiet ease, and the full yet not immodest assurance of her glance, the manners of one accustomed to fight the world for herself were very obvious; in the third, there was an indefinable lack of the never-to-be-mistaken stamp of breeding.

"For all your clever counterfeit, my good girl," reflected Sir Everard, "you haven't the ring of the guinea gold."

Yet he reproached himself for the accusation. Here was, after all, no counterfeit; very good metal of its kind. "Fine yellow brass," thought he with a chuckle. "All in a good sense, my dear."

What was she? From whence and whither speeding? Not an actress. That fresh, close-textured skin had never known paint on its flower-like surface. The cheeks were not even rouged; indeed, after the flush of bustle, the colour of them was now settling back in a curious ivory pallor, which went well with the ardent hair. No fine lady's young woman; every movement had betrayed conscious independence. A shop-girl? The wife of some small merchant? Nay, 'twas the impersonation of maiden liberty, and what shop-girl could encompass such a wealth and detail of modishness?

She caught his gaze upon her, leaned forward and smiled. He had already noticed that her smile was rather dazzling. He quite blinked to find it addressed to himself.

"I trust, sir," said she, "my bandboxes do not incommode you?"

"By no means, madam," answered he civilly; and moved his long, thin legs back a further fraction beneath the seat.

"I haven't been home," said she, "for four years, and luggage do grow when one has five young sisters at home, sir, and presents run to hats."

"To hats?" he repeated, with that interested air that obviates the audacity of a question.

"Along, sir," said Miss Pounce, and her smile broadened, "with me being in the millinery business."

She drew herself up with a very pretty and, to his mind, becoming pride.

"A business," he said, "which I take it, madam, is in a flourishing condition."

"You may say so, sir." Her pride increased. "Since Miss Pamela Pounce—that's me!—has been made head of the department, Madame Mirabel can scarce execute the vast number of orders."

"Upon my word!" He had removed his spectacles, and was smiling on her in his turn in a kindly, detached, faintly satiric way. "I trust Madame What's-Her-Name recognizes her debt to you?"

The head milliner gave her curls ever so slight a toss.

"Well, sir, she wouldn't like to lose me. She knows I'm worth my weight in gold to her."

His glance flickered over her comely proportions. Tall, generously made, he had called her a nymph. "Goddess would have been the better appellation," murmured he.

"Well, 'tis a comfort to an old man like myself to meet one so youthful to whom work is proving both fruitful and blessed."

Miss Pamela Pounce didn't need any old gentleman to commend her. She knew the value of work, and who better? And if it was blessed to her, why she took good care that it should be. And, as to content with her lot—sure, if she hadn't been, she wasn't a fool, she'd have picked out another for herself.

"'Tis some old clergyman," so she thought, and laughed. "He'll scarce know what a hat means. Clergyman's wives and daughters in the country would give any woman of taste bad dreams for a fortnight. There was Mrs. Prue Stafford. Had she not still to learn that to wear pink and blue with such cheeks as she had was positive vulgar? And she married to the finest of fine gentlemen."

Sir Everard folded his spectacles, put them carefully into his breast pocket, and closed his Virgil. Here was an opportunity of studying a—to him—hitherto quite unknown branch of humanity, after an unexpectedly pleasant fashion. The girl pleased him. He had called her brass and humoured the simile. A shining, solid composition of metal that took a handsome polish and showed itself boldly for what it was. He liked her for her spring of youth, her frank pride of her trade, for having no petty nonsense nor poor pretentiousness to pass for what she was not. He liked her brave independence. There was, he thought, a better modesty in her quiet certainty than any prudish airs and graces could have lent her.

"'Twould be a presuming fellow," he mused, "that would dare to try his gallant ways with such an one, and if he did, I would back my young milliner to teach him a lesson."

She told him how she had, so to speak, graduated in Paris, which accounted, thought he, for a taste that was scarcely indigenous. And her home was between Canterbury and Dover, and she, brought up till seventeen on the farm, the eldest of eleven. Then he knew whence she had drawn that sap of splendid vigour; a hardy flower of English soil. And the chief of his many prides being that he was an Englishman, he was still better content.

She would alight, she told him, at "The Rose" at Canterbury, where she would lie the night. And father would fetch her in the morning; for 'twas mortal cold across the downs on a winter's evening, and 'twas a long drive for the mare even in good weather.

"Bravo," said he. "I, too, halt at 'The Rose.' I am glad to know that I shall have such good company. May I sit beside you at supper in the eating-room, my dear young lady?"

"Oh, you're vastly obliging, sir!" said Pamela Pounce, and a faint pink crept, like the colour of a shell, into her smooth, pale cheek, for she had a good eye for a gentleman, and she knew that she was honoured.

Her tongue ran on gaily, and he listened with a gentle air of courtesy and an interest which in truth was not assumed.

In spite of her sophisticated manner her chatter was very artless. It was a revelation of character which had remained curiously untouched by the world. The busy mart in which she lived had cast none of its dust upon her soul.

Dear, to be sure, how prodigious joyful they would be at home to see her back!

"Four years, sir, think on it! I was but a child when I left them, and now I'm a woman!" 'Twas like, indeed, that none would recognize her again, should they just happen to meet, accidental like. She half wished she could have walked in upon them and taken them by surprise. But then: "Father, sir, would ha' lost the pleasure of coming to fetch me," and her mother might have been vexed. "Mother's very house-proud, sir. She'd want to have things pretty for me, and bake cakes and that."

And they'd all be looking out for her on the house step. Just to think of their dear faces fair turned her silly. She blinked away a tear and gave her bright smile. But as he smiled back it was with a certain melancholy. The farmer with his eleven children—poor, struggling fellow!—the hardworked mother, the good, industrious child, returning home with her hands full of gifts, blessed in her honest toil for them, were they not all about to taste joys from which he had deliberately cut himself off in his fastidious isolation? He had scarcely ever regretted his chosen solitariness. His beautiful old shabby home, set in the loneliness of the snowy park, the wood fire in the library in the company of a favourite book, the ministrations of a couple of well-drilled servants, an austere silence, a harmonious communion with the high spirits of the dead; that was the Christmas to which he himself had looked forward with complacency. Now he wondered; his heart contracted with a most unusual sense of pain; had he lost the best in life? If he had had a daughter by his shoulder with a white, pure forehead such as this girl had, and had seen her eyes fire with love, heard her voice tremble at the thought of meeting him, her old father, would not that have brought him a sweetness finer than the most exquisite page in Virgil?

The day, which had opened blue and gold, with a high wind and clear sunshine, began to gather threatening clouds by the time the posting station was reached; and the "Dover High-Flyer" plunged away again into a snow squall with all the speed of its fresh horses.

"We are like to have a seasonable Christmas," quoth Sir Everard, and was pleased to note that, while the rest of the company grumbled and complained, the fine specimen of young womanhood opposite to him produced a warm shawl from a bundle, tucked it round her knees, and offered him the other end, declaring, with a smile, that she was as warm as a toast, and that she did love a white Christmas.

They all dined at Rochester, and had hot punch, of which Miss Pounce partook with enthusiasm, but in very discreet measure.

Conversation flagged on this, their last, stage. The snoring of the foreign pair who, having tied their heads up in terrible coloured handkerchiefs, leant against each other and gave themselves up to repose with much the same animal abandonment as that with which they had gobbled the beef-steak pie and gulped the hot rum of the "Bull Inn" at Rochester; the sighing fidgets of the farmer's wife, and the grunts of her neighbor, the Dover tradesman, each time they jarred him from a fitful somnolence, alone broke the inner silence. Without, the multiple rhythm of the horses' hoofs and the varying answer of the road to the wheels—now the crunch of cobble stones, now the slushy whisper of the snow-filled rut, now the whirring ring of a well-metalled stretch—formed a monotonous whole which lulled to silence those who could not sleep.

Sir Everard saw, by the shifting flicker of the lamps, how pensiveness gathered on the bright face opposite him. Once or twice the girl raised a finger to the corner of her eyelid as if to press back a rising tear; sighs lifted her bosom.

"Ah!" thought the old philosopher, "the goddess of modes is not so fancy free as I had thought. Here, truly, are all the signs of a gentle love tale. Perhaps the young man in the counting-house, or some sprightly haberdasher, who sees Miss pass to her work, and would fain capture for his own counter a face so fair and charming."

Sir Everard felt very old and stiff by the time Canterbury was reached, and half regretted his suggestion to his travelling companion, to continue their comradeship at supper. He thought it might have better become his years and aching bones to retire into a feather bed with a basin of gruel. Far indeed was he from guessing the singular emotions into which his old age was destined to be plunged that evening.

A fine room with a four-poster, no less indeed than the chamber which went by the name of "Great Queen Anne," this was what the landlord proposed to allot to Sir Everard. A chimney you couldn't beat in the kingdom for drawing, mine host averred, and a fire there this minute; agreeable to Sir Everard's obliging communication. And what could he do for Miss?

Sir Everard was a little shocked to hear Miss Pounce enter upon a brisk bargain for an attic, and hesitatingly began a courteous offer of his own apartment, when she interrupted him with the valiant good sense which he had already had cause to admire in her.

"Not at all, sir! 'Tis what suits my station—so long as the sheets are clean and there's a good bolt to the door; you'll promise me that, Mr. Landlord? And if you can't spare a warming pan, sure a hot brick will do vastly well. And now, sir, give me time to see my band-boxes in safety, and I'm for supper."

Even as she spoke she started. Her eye became fixed, her lips fell open upon a gasp of amazement. The healthy white bloom of her countenance turned to deathly pallor, and then a tide of blood rushed crimsoning to her forehead. Beholding this evidence of strong emotion, it scarcely needed the sight that met Sir Everard's glance as he followed the direction of her eyes to confirm his instant conclusion. The young man, of course! Stay, the young man is a gentleman—poor nymph! Here then were joy, and fear, confusion, the warning of conscience, and artless passion, all mixed together.

The young gentleman advanced; a fine buck, of the very kind, thought Sir Everard, who took an instantaneous dislike to him, to turn the head of any girl beneath him in station, whom he might honour with his conquering regard. There was a black and white handsomeness about his chiselled countenance; all the powder in the world could not disguise that those jet eyebrows were matched with a raven spring of hair. With a smile, a dilation of nostrils, a swagger of broad shoulders, a leisurely step of high-booted legs, he came forward out of the tap-room. No surprise on his side: my gentleman had planned the meeting.

"La, Mr. Bellairs!" Pamela Pounce exclaimed, and her voice trembled. Then she rallied, and strove to pursue with lightness, "who ever would have thought of seeing you here?"

He took her hand and lifted it to his lips with an exaggerated courtesy, as if he mocked himself for it the while.

"Why, did I not guess rightly, my dear, you would be spending a lonely evening here on your way home?"

"Oh, Mr. Bellairs!"

He kept her hand in his, to draw her apart. Sir Everard, gazing at them, his chin sunk in his muffler, with severe, sad eyes, saw how she swayed towards him, as she went into the window recess, as if her very soul floated on the music of his voice. He watched them whisper ardently together, and then she went by him like a tornado, picking up her band-boxes as she passed, quite oblivious of his presence, or of anything, apparently, save the young rascal, so Sir Everard apostrophised him, who stood gazing after her with the same insufferable smile; the smile of the easy conqueror.

Sir Everard never had had a high opinion of women. Life had given him no reason to indulge in illusions. But now all his condemnation was for the man. The strong, self-reliant creature who had faced him all those weary hours with such unalterable good humour, such a candid outlook, such a pleasant acceptance of her own position that it was the next thing to high breeding, what was this Captain Lothario planning to make of her? And how, since he had found her already so hard to win that he must travel to Canterbury for the purpose, did she now thus readily yield herself to his plucking hand? Ay, the villain had struck at some peril point in the life of her soul. The child was tired after her long journey; tired, too, perhaps, by the mental conflict from which her integrity had hitherto emerged triumphant. A sudden assault had found the fortress unprepared. 'Twas the old story!

Sir Everard went wearily to his room. The thought of the feather bed and the gruel, of a selfish withdrawal from further association with what was like to end in sordid tragedy tempted him perhaps, but he did not yield to it. The girl's smile haunted him. It had been so brightly innocent; and he was haunted, too, by the last memory of her face, stricken with astonishment, quivering with joy. However she might fall, it would not be through light-mindedness. The folly, the misery, was deep rooted in her poor heart.

He made a careful toilet, and went down the slippery oak stairs, leaning on his gold-headed cane, looking a very great personage indeed, delicately austere and nobly haughty.

Alas! Pamela never so much as lifted her radiant head when he came into the eating room. She was seated beside her gallant at the end of the table in close conversation—that whispered, blushing, laughing, sighing conversation of lovers—and if the roof had fallen over them, Sir Everard thought, the two would scarce have noticed it, so absorbed were they in each other.

The young man had ordered champagne, and the girl's glass was filled, but the bubbling wine had barely been touched. Another intoxication, more deadly and more sure, was working through her veins. The old philosopher, seeing her condition, resigned for the moment all thought of interference, and sat down to his bottle of claret and bowl of broth.

Hardly, however, had he broken his hot roll, than the room was invaded by fresh arrivals; a young woman, wrapped in furs, conducted by a gentleman who had not removed his travelling coat, and kept his hat pressed on his brows; a personage who entered with an intolerable arrogance as if the place belonged to him, who ordered champagne and supper for the lady, and fresh horses for his coach, in a voice which rang like the crack of a whip. He could not wait; the servers must bustle. A guinea each to the ostlers if they harnessed within ten minutes. "And, hark ye, sirrah, a bottle of your best Silvery, and—"

"Surely I know this autocratic fellow," thought Sir Everard, and as the traveller drew his companion with an imperative sweep of his arm about her, to the end of the table opposite to that at which Mr. Bellairs and his Dulcinea were seated. "My Lord Sanquhar!" cried Sir Everard, "by all that's outrageous! And who in the name of pity is his victim now?"

That the two were lovers, of a stage considerably more advanced than the poor milliner and her Beau, was obvious to the onlooker, and as my Lord Sanquhar now tore his hat from his head, to dash the snow that covered it into the fire where it hissed and spluttered like a curse, the young woman who accompanied him let herself fall on to the settle and turned a look of darkling challenge, of brooding suspicion, into the room.

She was clad in the most sumptuous garments. There was a bloom of royal purple against the tawny clouds of her sables. There was a fire of ruby at her throat, caught up and repeated at each ear, as if deep gouts of a lover's blood had taken to themselves flame for her adorning. But the countenance she turned upon the room was, Sir Everard thought, so striking, that all this splendour seemed its natural attribute; striking with a Spanish beauty, a richness and depth of colour, with flashing orbs, high nostrils, and scarlet lips.

"Good Heavens!" Sir Everard mused, "where has he picked the jade? Victim? Nay, 'tis the kind that keeps a knife in her stocking and will whip it out and under your rib, and make an end of you with less ado than another will shed a tear. My Lord Sanquhar will have to look out for himself. Illicit love is a dangerously charged atmosphere in which to handle live gunpowder."

The "Dover High-Flyer" had only dropped two of its passengers at "The Rose," and the landlord was free to attend to his imperious guest. He himself served my Lord Sanquhar's champagne, and with bent back received his "pishs" and "pshaws" on the dearth of proper entertainment for the lady. She wanted fresh fruit, and there was none. She asked for chocolate, and pettishly refused to touch it. One sniff was enough. All her desires and denials she communicated in a guttural undertone to her companion, who translated them into oaths.

Sir Everard, who had had but a poor appetite, was now, his broth bowl pushed on one side, dipping bits of roll into his wine after a foreign fashion, and watching the while the two sets of lovers at the further end of the room. He noticed, not without some satisfaction, that nonstraint had fallen upon the ardent Bellairs and his fair milliner. The colour on the young man's face fluctuated. He bit his lip and shot doubtful looks of question from the blatant couple to the downcast countenance of his companion, who had grown very pale, scarcely spoke, and seemed now and again as if she was struggling with tears.

A clatter of hoofs, the clang of a bell, and a shout from the door announced another guest, a solitary horseman, it seemed. The landlord, who was just entering the room with a plate of dried plums in the hope of tempting the appetite of the capricious lady—he had scented my Lord's quality with unerring nose—here thrust the dish into the hands of a waiter and turned back to receive the newcomer. He had left the door open behind him and all could hear the passionate explosion of a hoarse voice in the hall.

The dark little lady on the settle by the fire sprang to her feet, and stood, tense. Her companion gave a swift frowning look of surprise. Sir Everard, gazing upon her also, drew a quick breath. "By the immortal gods," said he to himself, "the drama is coming swifter than one could have imagined." And, indeed, what the ancient quiet inn was destined to hold for the next ten minutes in the way of human passion, conflict, and tragedy, might happily be never as much as guessed at in the lifetime of most men.

The landlord, his wig awry, his features discomposed, puffing and blustering, was vainly endeavouring to prevent the ingress of a small thick-set man who though wrapped in a cloak and carrying some considerable burden, which he kept hidden under its folds, contrived by a single violent thrust of his shoulder, to send him spinning out of the way. The intruder advanced then at a headlong run, brought himself up short, flung back his cloak, and with the same gesture his hat, and stood revealed, swarthy grizzled, livid, panting through dilated nostrils, glaring upon the woman by the settle. There was a great flare of colour on his broad chest, where, wound in a scarlet shawl, a little child of about two, with a head of curls of that dark copper hue destined to turn black with years, lay placidly asleep; the curve of a plump apricot cheek was all that was visible of its face.

"Good heavens," said Sir Everard, and at the sight of the sleeping innocence something in his old heart began to lament.

There was a moment's extraordinary silence, broken only by the breathing of the man with the child, which hissed through his set teeth like the strokes of a saw. Then my Lord Sanquhar laughed.

The man leaped as if he had been struck. A torrent of words broke from him—guttural, fierce, intolerably anguished. Sir Everard knew a little Spanish.

The unfortunate was pleading: "Come back, come back! I will forgive all. Come back, Dolores, you cannot leave us. You cannot leave the little one. Come back in the name of God, in the name of His Holy Mother. Madre di Dios, look at her! You cannot leave that! Ah! unhappy one, you want gold and jewels. Was not our love your treasure? Is not our child a pearl? Look at her!"

In singular contrast to the unrestrained violence of his outburst, the manner in which he held out the child was pure, tender. The little one woke, stared about her with devouring black eyes of amazement, caught sight of the standing woman's face and cried, joyfully beating the air with minute dusky hands, "Mamma, mamma!"

At this a sob burst from the unhappy father, so deep and tortured it was as if it rent him.

"Dolores, our little girl, she calls you 'Mamma, mamma!' Call again my angel! Mamma, mamma!"

He went down on his knees and held out the babe, and as he did so she wailed.

The mother, meanwhile, stood, insolent lids half closed, red lips thrust forward, tapping the floor with impatient foot, the embodiment of cruel disdain.

At her child's cry she stuffed her fingers into her ears with savage gesture, stamped, and flung a raging glance at her lover as one who said, "How long am I to endure this?"

He answered it by the movement of a beckoning finger, which brought her to his side. Then he cast a gold piece on the table, clapped his hat on his head, and together they moved towards the door.

"Ah! By the blessed saints!"

The Spaniard in a bound was before them. He shook the screaming infant in their faces as if it had been a weapon.

"I swear this shall not be. I swear that I shall kill you and your paramour and the child and myself rather than that this shall be."

It was here that Pamela caught the little one from him. He was perhaps too far gone in passion to notice the action; perhaps he was glad to have his hands free for his fierce purpose—anyhow, he relaxed his hold. And the girl, clasping the baby in her arms, hushing it and soothing it, ran with it to the further end of the room. Sir Everard had also risen and Bellairs had started forward. But it would have been as easy to baulk a wild cat of its leap as to arrest the betrayed husband in his spring upon his betrayer.

No one ever quite knew how it happened. There was the flash of a knife, an oath, and my Lord Sanquhar's "Damn you, you would have it!" and the explosion of a pistol.

The Spaniard fell without a groan, right across the doorway. Sir Everard and Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs both knew that he was a dead man before he touched the ground.

"You are witness all," said my Lord Sanquhar, "that this was in self-defence."

The woman cast a backward glance into the room. Her rich bloom had faded. She was white but with a palpitating whiteness as of fire at its intensest, and the gaze of her great eyes was as fire too. Almost red they shone, repeating the blood fires of the rubies. Then she gave herself to Lord Sanquhar's embrace, and together they rushed out into the night.

"Odds my life!" said Mr. Bellairs, looking up at Sir Everard. He had flung himself on one knee beside the stricken man, and was going through the vain parade of seeking for a pulse which he knew no longer beat. "Did you see that, sir?"

"He lifted her across her husband's very body! He lifted her right across the body?" said Sir Everard, in a hushed voice of disgust.

"Lifted her? Sir, she jumped!"

Pamela kept the child's face turned against her breast with a loving hand, and as she rocked and soothed, she herself wept as if her heart would break.

Through the doors, cast open to the night, the roar of a new snow wind hurtled in upon them. There followed a sudden clamour of voices, as the host endeavoured to arrest my lord's departure and was borne down, wellnigh annihilated, from his path; the crackling shout of my lord's orders; the plunge and clatter of hoofs on the cobbles. It seemed as if the blood-guilty pair had gone on the wings of the storm, and that the very elements cried after them as they went.

Sir Everard, as the most responsible witness, assisted the landlord in the preliminary investigation of magistrate and constable. He took a certain grim pleasure in furnishing Lord Sanquhar's name, and trusted the nobleman might an interest so vital that both the faces now turned upon him were stamped with fierce emotion.

Sir Everard removed a chair from before the table and sat down on it facing the fire, and for a space no one spoke.

Pamela had cast the scarlet shawl across one shoulder so as to shade the child's head from the light. Her hand patted and her knees swayed, rocking the infant sleeper.

"Poor little creature!" said Sir Everard at last.

The girl gave him a quick glance. "I'll keep her to-night. I've told the landlord I would, and I'd keep her always if I could."

"'Tis a generous thought," said the old gentleman, with a faint smile for the magnanimous impracticabilities of youth, and as he smiled he was aware that Mr. Bellairs snapped his fingers and jerked his foot on the edge of irritable outburst.

Suddenly Pamela began to sob quickly under her breath, turned her head aside so that her tears should not fall on the little placid face.

"I've been a wicked girl! A wicked girl!"

"Hush!" cried Mr. Bellairs, and flung

In spite of the burden of the child in her arms, she had to wait for him on every landing.

be summoned to answer for his action. Even if acquittal were a foregone conclusion, to a reputation already tarnished this incident was not likely to add a lustre. By the quality of the murdered man's clothes, the massive gold of his watch-chain, the signet ring on his dead hand, it was judged that he was a merchant of the better class, and that the unfortunate incident would probably make some stir among his compatriots.

The cold and stiffening body which had been so short a while before pulsing with agony and passion, was laid in the harness-room of the inn, covered with a white sheet. Scarce ten yards away the grey horse that had borne its rider on the wild race to death was placidly munching its corn, the sweat not yet dry on its flanks.

When Sir Everard returned to the eating-room he found Pamela still on the settle, the child asleep on her lap. On the board beside her a half-finished bowl of bread and milk showed that she had been occupied with the worse than motherless babe, while he had attended to the last concerns of its doomed father. On the other side of the hearth, one elbow propped on the high mantelshelf, stood Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs. The old man's entrance had evidently interrupted a conversation between the two lovers, of out his hand

"No, sir; I won't be silent!"

"But, good God, my dear, need you drag this stranger into our intimate concerns?"

"He's no stranger to me, Mr. Bellairs. We travelled down in the coach together, and he couldn't have been more civil to me if I'd been a lady born; no, nor kinder if he'd been my father. Oh, sir, I don't know your name, but I know by the pitying way you looked at me that you understood what dreadful danger I was in and how—again she sobbed—"how ready I was to yield to it! He wanted me to go to Paris with him. He did, indeed! He wanted his love to be my all-in-all, and nothing else was to matter. I've been a wicked girl! I listened to him. I never would listen to him before—not when he spoke like that—but to-night I did. Heaven forgive me! What took me?"

"Confound!" said Mr. Bellairs.

He wheeled away from the sight of her weeping, clutched the mantelpiece with both hands, and dropped his head on them.

"Well, 'tis all over now."

Sir Everard spoke uneasily. This openness upon a subject so delicate was painful to him, but Pamela had the yearning to relieve herself by confession.

"Oh, sir, how could I do it? I don't know myself. I swear when I look back 'tis as if I had not been myself at all. Something came into me—so rash, so desperate! 'Twas as if nothing mattered but just his love, our love. And then—then—when those two came in I saw our sin as it was. Oh, heavens! Oh, Heaven forgive me! Murder and every evil was there. Would I not have been just as cruel, done just as horrid murder? When the truth came out, would my father and mother and my own dear loves at home, waiting for me so fond and so trusting, and so proud of their poor, silly Pam, ever have held up their heads again? Oh, base, base! I would have murdered them for my pleasure. And that love, what was it? The thing that those two looked at each other, something vile, something that brought contamination even just to see go between them. Did he and I look at each other like that? It turned me sick even to think on, even before—before that poor, poor man came in! Heaven forgive me! Heaven strike those two in their bad hearts! Oh, sir, did you look at her when she stared back upon us, that woman? I suppose there was beauty in her face; I suppose he who went with her thought her handsome airs worth the cruelty and the blood and the crime on his soul. But to me she was ugly, all ugly, with the ugliness of her sin—"

She broke off, bit her quivering lip, and stared fixedly before her; an expression of horror on her countenance as if she still beheld the ugliness of which she spoke.

Mr. Bellairs straightened himself and snapped his fingers again.

"Tall talk, my dear," he began; and then broke off, dropped his eyes under Sir Everard's stern gaze, and stood abashed. Then: "Perhaps you're right," he said in an altered, strangled voice; and dashed from the room as if driven.

Pamela started, glanced after him, and then wiped her wet cheeks with the end of the baby's shawl.

"Let him go," she said.

"You're a brave girl."

"Oh no, sir! Only so grateful, so wonderfully saved, so ashamed. Oh, this little creature against my breast—must I not feel it—think of it—if I had had my foolish way I should never have been worthy to hold such a lovely, lovely little dear in my arms again."

Sir Everard insisted on lighting Pamela to her attic chamber. She went up before him with a step so elastic, in spite of the burden of the child in her arms, that she had to wait for him on every landing; which she did with a return of her bright amiability and even a flicker of its former radiance in her smile. Each time she halted she rocked the baby, swaying from foot to foot, murmuring under her breath a crooning song which the old man thought very sweet; so sweet indeed, that, with a swing of memory's pendulum it brought him back to his own childhood's days and the tender face of his mother, long dead—a mother who had never been old like him.

On the threshold of her poor room they parted. She spared him her right hand for a second from its motherly caressing and patting of the child which she bore with such ease on her left arm. He bowed over it as if it had been his queen's.

When he went down to the flaming hearth which justified the landlord's boast, he sat long by it.

He, who had hitherto lived apart in a world of books, found his mind obsessed by the thought of the frightful passions of humanity as they had this night played themselves out before him.

The whole scene reproduced itself in his tired brain with the colours of life; Lord Sanquhar's sardonic, pale, haughty face, the rich vividness, the unblest allurements, the cruel beauty of the unfaithful wife; the Spaniard's agony; the irredeemable tragedy of that picture of the father with the child; then the dead face

"Heaven strike their bad hearts!" had cried Pamela in her honest revulsion. Could God ever forgive those who had sent forth the soul of their victim so charged with fury and despair that even death could bring no peace to his brow?

And then he thought of Pamela's face as he had last seen it—pale, tear-stained, but with the old luminous innocence. And, after all, he thought, there had come good out of the evil.

"The providence of God is over us all," he thought with gratitude, as he rose stiffly to seek that feather bed, where there was small likelihood of sleep that night for him.

He heard the call of a coach horn beyond, in the night, and immediately afterwards the mighty clatter of the four sets of hoofs and the rush of the wheels in the streets. He went to his window, opened it, and looked out.

The up coach from Dover, pausing only to drop a single passenger. Stay, to take up a passenger, too. Sir Everard recognized the swing of the shoulders, the tall, alert frame, the indefinable swagger, even though muffled in the many-caped travelling coat.

Young Bellairs was not going to Paris with a fair companion!

"Thank Heaven!" said Sir Everard.

CHAPTER V

IN WHICH MISS PAMELA POUNCE DEMONSTRATES THE VALUE OF VIRTUE TO HER FAMILY AND HER FRIENDS

"AND I'm sure, my dear," said Mrs. Pounce, the tears welling in her eyes as she gazed lovingly at her eldest daughter, "'tis the golden girl you've been to us!"

"Ah, you wait, mother!" cried Pamela. "Just you wait! If I don't finish paying off that there mortgage with the new spring fashions, call me Tabbishaw, that's all I say."

The force of condemnation for vulgar stupidity could go no further on Miss Pounce's lips.

Farmer Pounce, seated before the kitchen fire, turned his big, grizzled head to cast a glance no less affectionate than his wife's upon the good daughter.

"This time last year," he said; then, in a ruminating voice, "ah, 'twas a black look-out! As much as I could do to squeeze the interest on the borrowed money and the expenses of the new loan. And Sir Jasper, with his eye on the farm this long while, turning the screw on me, he and lawyer Grinder between them. Cruel hard terms they made me, cruel hard, but there, 'twasn't as if I didn't know their little game. Aye, aye, they were but waiting, the both of them, to sell me up and get me out of it all; the land my father's father's father called his own."

Mrs. Pounce wept at the mere recollection. Where would they have been, they and the little ones, but for the golden girl?

Pamela winked away a bright tear of sympathy. Everything about this girl was bright; the spring of her chestnut hair from her white forehead, which itself shone as with a kind of luminosity, the glance of her full, shrewd eyes, the smile that curved her lips. Oh, above all, it was Pamela's smile that was bright with the gaiety and joy of life!

"Pish, you dears," she said now, and covered up her emotion with just one of those flashing smiles. "Don't be making too much of it. All those months I wasted at old Tabbishaw's didn't I know in my spirit it would all come right? Wasn't I sure the whole time?"—she played with her capable fingers in the air—"that there was a fortune in these hands once I could get them proper to work. And I tell you now, without vanity—oh, I ain't got a mite of vanity about it, 'tis my gift, the way pigs is father's gift—give me a yard of ribbon, a feather, and a bit of straw, and I'll turn you out two guineas before you can say 'knife'."

"Dear, to be sure," mused Mrs. Pounce, forgetting to knead her scones. "And think of the Christmas dinner we've had. A turkey fit for the Queen's table, though I says it as shouldn't. And me having to sell every one of my lovely birds last year and keep 'father on the salt beef, Christmas and all! And there's Susie, such a picture in the bonnet you trimmed for her, at morning service, that I'd never be surprised if Farmer Fleet's son were to come to the scratch to-night at Sir Jasper's barn dance, I shouldn't indeed."

"I've got a white cambric, mother, and blue ribbons ready for her," said Pamela, smacking her lips with gusto, "and a Shepherdess Dunstable. If that don't settle him! 'Tis the very thing, so simple and fresh, a sort of daisy-gown, father and mother, that'll start Master Tom thinking o' dairies and the clean linen and the white flour in the bin; and, 'What a modest, nice girl,' he'll say, 'The very wife for a farmer. No nonsense of cheap finery. Only what a maid could buy for herself and stitch at home,' he'll think, poor innocent, and it's the model for the French Queen at Trianon, where she plays at milk-maid, you'd never believe!"

"Mercy on us!" said Mrs. Pounce, with an uncomprehending stare. "Frenchies be queer people, to be sure."

"And Jenny and Betty shall wear the sprigged muslin," pursued Pamela. "And my little pet, Peg, the robe-coat I made her out of the odds and ends Madame Mirabel gave me from her ladies' counter."

"And what will you wear yourself, my dear?" asked the mother, cutting her rolled-out paste into neat rounds.

"Is it me, mother?" Pamela hesitated. Then: "I don't mean to go," says she.

"Not mean to go?" screamed the farmer's wife, blank disappointment writing itself on her good-humoured countenance.

cry—"you fair break my heart. Why, 'twas all my thought, these days and days, how I'd let neighbours see what a beauty my dear, good London da'ter be, and as elegant as any lady!"

"If you've got a reason for disappointing your mother, out with it, girl, so it's a good 'un," said Farmer Pounce, with some sternness.

Pamela tossed her head. She was never one for making mysteries.

"Well, father and mother, if you must know so particular, wasn't that Sir Jasper Standish as was driving the high curriole away from Pitfold Church this morning? The stout gentleman, with the kind of red eye, and it rolling?"

"Aye, aye," grumbled the farmer, "the very man, my dear, and a hard gentleman he be. And queer tales there are about him. 'Tis a good thing he comes to Standish Hall but seldom. Aye, aye, 'twas him driving them bloods in the curriole. And a mort of fine ladies and gentlemen in the barouche. They'll be staying Christmas, I reckon."

"Aye," corroborated Mrs. Pounce. "A twenty-pound jar of my best salt, and Pamela snapped her thread.

"You do want to know a lot, don't you, mother dear? But there! There's no reason why I shouldn't tell you. I've done nothing to be ashamed of. That young gentleman has the good taste to admire me a mortal lot, but he ain't got the good taste, in my opinion, to admire me the right way. He came after me to Canterbury, knowing I was due here for my Christmas holiday, and I sent him packing, and, thinks I, 'tis done now, once for all, and we'll be the best of friends at a distance. And you could have knocked me down with a feather when I see his black eye roaming round the church this morning. Encourage him by going with you to-night? That would never do, Pamela, my girl! says I to myself, and—"

"What dost mean by the right way, daughter?" interrupted the farmer, who had been ruminating her words, and not found them to his liking. The veins of his forehead were swelled; the hand that gripped the wooden arm of his chair shook.

"I mean the wrong way. Now, father, don't you be a-working yourself up. I can look after myself, and ain't that just what I'm doing? Mother, I vow your cap will beat the one I made for the Duchess of Queensberry all to nothing. Now, won't the children be pleased when they find those cakes all piping hot, mother? They ought to be in soon now—back from Rector's. I'd like to try the little gown on my poppet ere you put her to rest to-night."

It was the first party Sir Jasper had invited to Standish Hall since the death of his wife, and lavish as was his hospitality, the loss of that incomparable woman had never been more painfully felt. A widower-forlornness was over everything. Dusty, flowerless, unkempt the parlours; discomfort, an open negligence of refined detail, the lack of the controlling hand, in fine, was sensible to all his guests.

The Christmas dinner was over, and the ladies had retired. If you had cared to have examined the bottles in rows on the floor, or the cut-glass decanters on the table, you would have found that the company had drawn considerably on Sir Jasper's generous cellar, and had not scrupled to mix very freely.

Sir Jasper and his youngest male guest, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, were at the height of an argument, egged on and applauded by good-natured Squire Upshott, and that saturnine rake, Sir James Devlin, while Lawyer Grinder, from Canterbury, leaned back, smiling grimly, his grey fingers round his glass, his grey eyes acute, his large ears pricked outside his scratch wig for any business advantage the holiday dissipation should lay open.

"Pshaw! My dear fellow, the girl's been three years in Paris, I tell you! You'll not have me believe she's better than her neighbours. Why, don't I know all about her? Isn't her father squatting on a bit of land that juts into my ring fence—pon honour, like a fly in a man's honey—eh, Grinder? As handsome a slut as I ever laid eyes on, if that's the bouncer I saw at church this morning. If you're after her, lad, go in and win! If not, step aside, and make room for your elders!"

Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs took a draught from the beaker in front of him, then cast rather a wild glance at his host.

"You!" cried he. "You step in with Pamela Pounce! My dear Sir Jasper, I do not intend to be uncivil, but the idea is too droll!"

"How now? Is Miss so difficult? You know 'tis but a milliner."

"Ay, I know more of her, I dare swear, than you do. Difficult? Well, Sir Jasper, you or anyone may try their chances so far as I am concerned—I would not give that for them"—snapping his fingers. "Pure waste! When I tell you that I have failed—"

The unconscious cockseembry was greeted with a shout of laughter.

"Hark to him!" cried old Upshott. "Odds life!" jeered Sir Jasper. "You stimulate me! So fastidious!"

"Nay!" Young Bellairs flung a fine black eye about him. "So virtuous," said he, his voice sinking quite an octave deeper than its usual gay note.

There was another laugh, and then a silence, and then Sir Jasper repeated drawing.

"So virtuous." It all depends what the virtue is—eh, gentlemen? There's pru-

The Scarlet Trails

By Lloyd Roberts

*Crimson and gold in the paling sky;
The rampikes black where they tower on high,—
And we follow the trails in the early dawn
Through the glades where the white frosts lie.*

*Down where the flaming maples meet;
Where the leaves are blood before our feet;
We follow the lure of the twisting paths
While the air tastes thin and sweet.*

*Leggings and jackets are drenched with dew;
The long twin barrels are cold and blue;
But the glow of the Autumn burns in our veins,
And our eyes and hands are true.*

*Where the sun drifts down from overhead,
(Tangled gleams in the scarlet bed)
Rush of wings through the forest aisle—
And the leaves are a brighter red.*

*Loud drum the cocks in the thickets nigh;
Grey is the smoke where the ruffed grouse die.
There's blackened shells in the trampled ferns
When the white moon swims the sky.*

"Tut! tut!" cried the farmer, and wheeled himself round in his chair.

The London girl coloured, and a shadow came over her face.

"Some one's got to stay at home and look after little Tom," said she stoutly, "and him but ten months old, the poor fond lamb!"

She glanced at the wooden cradle to the left of the hearth, where, under a patch-work quilt, a chubby miniature reproduction of the farmer was lying, with fists clenched in a determined fashion, as if he defied anyone to rob him of his repose.

"Why, I never heard such nonsense!" Mrs. Pounce gathered the cuttings of paste together and dabbed them into a single lump with an irritable hand.

"And who's minded little Tom, do ye think, all the hours, miss, that I've got to be butter-making, plucking of geese, and cutting up pig for the salting? Who but old Nance, my love, who looked after yourself when you was no bigger than the little 'un there?"

"She's getting very old," said Pamela. "I caught her nodding yesterday with the Blessing on her lap, and he as near as anything into the cinders. Besides, my mind's made up, and there's no use your trying to unmake it. I've my reasons, and that's all there is to it."

"Why, Pam, why, lovey?"—Mrs. Pounce had a grimace like an infant about to six turkeys, no less, not to speak of the geese—aye, and a ham, cured in that very chamber in the chimbley, child. But, dear, to be sure, was you set against meeting Sir Jasper just for the seeing of him step into his curriole?"

"You didn't happen to note, mother, the gentleman who stepped in after him?"

Farmer Pounce and his wife exchanged a scared look, and then by common consent transferred it to their daughter. There was silence, broken only by the cheerful song of the kettle on its chain over the embers, and the stertorous breathing of the infant farmer in the cot.

Then, with a catch in her breath: "Well, child?" ventured Mother Pounce.

Once more Pamela tossed her head. She was seated at a corner of the kitchen table, needle, scissors, and workbox at her elbow, and she turned and twisted the lilac satin rosette in her hand.

"Well," she said at last, without looking up. "I don't happen to want to meet him, that's all."

"How, my dear?" Mrs. Pounce shot a frightened glance at her husband's grim face, and another at her daughter's bright bent head.

"Ain't the young gentleman a friend of yours?" she asked faintly.

"THE next time we move," said Mrs. Winthrop reflectively, "The next time we move, I want a little house. I'm sick and tired of long halls, and big kitchens and endless steps. I wish you had to take a few of them Will, then you might realize what I've had to put up with in all these years."

Dropping his newspaper on the floor, Mr. Winthrop looked in surprise at his gentle little wife. "What are you talking about Margaret?" he demanded. "I think the houses we have lived in have been very comfortable, roomy and cool with plenty of space to move around in. Of course we have moved rather often but—"

"We have moved exactly fifteen times in the last thirty years," interrupted his wife, "and each house has been as bad as the one before it."

"But it was worth while to live in them. We always made money by it," insisted her husband.

"I didn't mind so much when the children were small and we had to have money," continued Mrs. Winthrop, "but now it is different. We two are the only ones at home and it is ridiculous for us to live in a regular barracks. I think it is time I had some say about our home. I have to work in it."

"Well," said Mr. Winthrop unwillingly, "Maxwell spoke of buying this place for a client of his who would like to open a boarding house for the Normal students. If I come to terms with him perhaps you can pick out the sort of house you want. The trouble is that small houses are all the rage now, and they cost like the dickens."

"There is a photograph of one I like in last week's Illustrated World," remarked his wife. "It has casement windows and broad porches and a sun parlor. There are tubs in the basement. The kitchen is wired for an electric stove and—"

"You never got all that information out of the World," interrupted her husband. "You must have seen the house."

"I did," confessed Mrs. Winthrop shyly. "It is on Osborne Boulevard near those lots you showed me last week. I went through it from garret to cellar, and I fell in love with it, I wish we could buy it ourselves."

"Well, we can't," her husband assured her sharply. "Houses on the Boulevard are beyond our means. Perhaps you will find a small one somewhere else. If I hear of any in the office, I'll let you know."

"And you won't take another house without consulting me?" his wife asked suspiciously.

"No! No! Of course not!" replied her husband. "Didn't I just say you could choose a house to suit yourself?"

Feeling as if a great burden had been removed from her shoulders, Mrs. Winthrop settled comfortably in her chair and prepared to finish darning the worn garment in her lap. Being the wife of a Real Estate agent, she had learned to dread the Spring because so often it had involved a hurried flitting to another house which Mr. Winthrop had obtained in the course of his business. With the assurance that she herself could choose their next house, Mrs. Winthrop could actually look forward to a change of abode, and while she sewed her mind was busy making plans. It would be so wonderful to have the kind of house she liked, little and sunny and clean, with lots of cupboards in the kitchen and a sun room for her to lie in during the afternoons.

But one evening toward the end of April, Mr. Winthrop came home so late for dinner, and was obviously so troubled and abstracted during the meal, that his wife knew something had happened. Still she could not bear to ask what it was. She felt so afraid that it might keep her from having the new house. She could only say to herself over and over again, "If Will has played a trick on me, I can't bear it. It would be too much."

They had almost finished dessert when at last her husband spoke. "Well, we will soon be out of this house," he began with an effort to seem at ease. "I made the arrangements with Maxwell this afternoon. His client wants possession on the fifteenth of next month. That will give you plenty of time to pack up."

Then as suddenly as it had come, Mrs. Winthrop's suspicion vanished. Her face grew radiant with anticipation. She laughed the dearest little, chuckling laugh. "Then I can begin to look for my house," she cried, "My little house."

The Little House

As if he could not bear to meet her shining, confident eyes, her husband looked down at his plate. "Well, not just yet, Margaret," he began awkwardly. "You see part of the deal with Maxwell was that I should take over the old Brown house on Smith street. It is smaller than this, more convenient. I thought we could live there until I have an opportunity to sell it or rent it to someone else."

"You mean," said Mrs. Winthrop in a queer, strained voice, "You mean that you have taken another house without my even seeing it? You want me to move there to Smith street?"

"Just for a few months," her husband assured her, relieved that she understood. "Well then I won't!" flashed his wife. "I'm done with moving. I'm done with everything."

He doesn't care about what I want. He never has cared."

Downstairs the telephone rang. Mrs. Winthrop heard her husband answer it and scraps of sentences floated to her keen ears. As she listened to them the first faint glimmer of an idea stirred in her mind. Going to her closet she took out the blue serge suit which had done duty for several seasons and the trim little purple hat she wore with it. Slipping these on, she turned to the mirror to adjust her veil and while she was standing there she noticed with astonishment the new expression in her clear blue eyes. The wistful gentleness was gone. In its stead had come a look of determination and unexpected strength.

"I've been a fool long enough," Mrs. Winthrop said to herself. "Now I'm Upstairs in her bedroom, Mrs. Winthrop sat down on the box that did duty for a window-seat, and remained quietly there for a long, long time. She counted the number of times she had moved and estimated the labor involved in each migration.

While her husband stared at her in amazement too great for words, Mrs. Winthrop got up from her seat and walked slowly towards the door. "Don't come with me," she commanded, "Don't come with me. I've got to be alone."

UPSTAIRS in her bedroom, Mrs. Winthrop sat down on the box which did duty for a window seat and remained quietly there for a long, long time. She counted the number of times she had moved and estimated the labor involved in each migration. She recalled the scrubbing and cleaning, the laying of carpets, and the stretching of curtains. She pictured the long array of ugly rooms in the ugly houses in which they had always seemed to be forced to live, and her resentment against her husband's arbitrary conduct grew into a flame of anger.

"Will cheated me," she said to herself. "He never meant to keep that promise, going to change my ways."

When she left the house, Mrs. Winthrop took the car directly to Osborne Boulevard, then walked eastward until she came to the large tract of land in which a small garden and little, white cottage stood out like an oasis in a desert of barren earth. Intently she endeavored to recall every word of the old conversation with her husband concerning his options on some of these lots.

"I've taken options on all of these lots, Margaret," he had explained in one of those expansive moods when he liked her to realize his cleverness. "A syndicate is after them for a new apartment house. I'm bound to make money for there isn't another block of land out here which is large enough for their plans. There is one fly in the ointment though. The old lady who owns the cottage and garden has refused to give me the scratch of a pen. I think she is holding out for a bigger price. She is a sort of crank, and cherishes a grudge against men.

Still I'll manage her some way. She is poor and money talks."

"Money talks," Mrs. Winthrop repeated to herself with a wry little smile. "But I'll talk too, and I'll talk first."

Then she opened the white picket gate and walked rapidly up the long path between the beds of early tulips which flung their challenge to the cool April air.

Mrs. Winthrop was a long time in the cottage. When the door opened again, the old woman who owned it came outside with her visitor, picked a few flowers for her and when Mrs. Winthrop said a pleasant good-bye stood watching her as long as she was in sight. "A bonnie woman, she has been in her day," the old lady commented to herself. "I hope she gets her way. 'Twould be good to see that husband of hers get his come-uppance. He made me tired the way he came into my house and tried to dictate to me."

Whatever Mrs. Winthrop accomplished by her visit, she said nothing about it to her husband who came in while she was busy washing the dishes which she had neglected earlier in the evening. With the air of a boy who wishes to make amends for a fault, he took a towel to dry some of them for her, while he kept up a flow of casual remarks intended to distract his wife's thoughts from the subject of houses. Mrs. Winthrop listened in apparent good humor. She even managed to laugh once or twice. In fact it was difficult for her to keep from laughing when she remembered her little excursion on Osborne Boulevard. Mr. Winthrop however, was absolutely reassured by her mirth. "Margaret has got over her mad fit," he said to himself. "I thought she would."

The next day Mr. Winthrop forgot the trouble over the Brown house in a new annoyance which he explained at some length to his wife. "I'm worried about obtaining the option on that cottage which I pointed out to you," he said. "The Syndicate people are almost ready to buy, but when I went to see the old woman who owns the cottage she was like adamant, and would not even discuss selling to me. I could wring her silly neck. Here she has a chance to make more money than she ever owned before, yet she refuses to take it."

"Perhaps she is attached to the place," suggested his wife.

"Attached to it!" repeated Mr. Winthrop with immeasurable scorn in his voice. "You women make me tired! What is there about a house that one should become attached to it? I don't care where we live."

Mrs. Winthrop checked the retort that rose to her lips. It was to her own interest to stick to the subject of the cottage and she asked pleasantly, "Will it matter much if you obtain possession of the place? Will you be terribly disappointed?"

"Disappointed!" ejaculated her husband, "Disappointed! I thought you knew something about business Margaret. Goodness knows I've tried hard enough to teach you! I'll be ruined without that option. If necessary I'd pay ten thousand for it this very minute."

Then Mrs. Winthrop turned quietly to the big roll top desk in a corner of the room, unlocked a drawer and handed a paper to her wondering husband.

"There is the option," she said. "I got it last night. You men don't know how to deal with women."

* * *

MRS. WINTHROP read the paper. He read it twice. Then with an expansive smile he tried to put an arm around his wife's slender waist.

"You are a wonder Margaret," he said admiringly. "This puts me on easy street. I can go right ahead with the Syndicate people now."

"Don't be so sure," advised Mrs. Winthrop coolly. "Remember that the option is mine, not yours."

"But you got it for me of course," cried her husband. "You deserve a commission. What do you say to a couple of hundred dollars for a trip to see Helen?"

"You will have to pay more than a couple of hundred," insisted Mrs. Winthrop. "You'll have to pay the ten thousand you just told me that the option was worth."

"Ten thousand!" exploded her husband. "Are you crazy Margaret?"

Gaspard's shack lay far to the east of the main trail and it required all her wood-craft to follow the seldom-used path that led in that direction. A cry of relief rose to her lips when she came suddenly upon the little log hut nestling cozily in a circle of tamarack and balsam. But to-day it had a desolate look. No smoke curled up from the snow-laden roof. No sound disturbed the intense, throbbing silence. A strange foreboding clutched her heart as she approached and knocked sharply. No answer—could she have come too late? But that was impossible. She was trembling with anxiety as she entered.

For a moment she thought the room was empty. Everything was in disorder, the fire almost out. But as she grew accustomed to the dimness she discerned the outline of a still figure on a bunk in the corner by the fire-place. At her approach the woman turned a wan face toward her. It was Jeanne, but what a change! Pneumonia was doing its deadly work. The beautiful butterfly from Chateauguay had made its last flight.

"She is marked for death," thought Madelaine, "but I must try to save her for Gaspard's sake." Soon the wood-stove was roaring cheerily and she held a steaming drink to Jeanne's pale lips. "Ah, Madelaine," sighed the sick woman, "thank God you came in time. I prayed so hard, here all alone. It would be dreadful to die alone." The tired eyelids closed and she sank into a peaceful sleep.

Madelaine worked and watched feverishly, but still no Gaspard. She feared he must have fallen a victim to one of the countless accidents to which the woodsman is exposed. In reality he had gone to Otter Lake to attend to his traps and had wrenched his knee so badly that he had been forced to take refuge with the "Protestant Priest," a stalwart prophet of the wilderness whose headquarters were in that vicinity. That decided person who was well versed in physical as well as spiritual ailments, knowing that he was quite unfit for the ten-mile journey home, had induced him to rest a day or two, much against his will.

All through the night Jeanne slept quietly and only roused at intervals during the following day. It was toward evening that a fierce roar from Bijou announced the arrival of the enemy. Gaspard he knew and loved, but Paul Olier was his pet aversion and he proclaimed the fact in no uncertain tone.

Madelaine threw her cloak about her and hurried outside. This frightful din would waken Jeanne, and she must keep the intruders at bay as long as possible. She had thought out her plan of action carefully, and though her face was white and strained it was illumined by the light of a great sacrifice.

"Jacques," she called across the snow-piled clearing, "I want you; it is Madelaine."

The Honor of the North

There was a sound of altercation among the dusky tamaracks, then a dark figure detached itself from the shadows and in a twinkling the swarthy woodsman stood before her.

Madelaine wrung her hands in an agony of pleading. "Jacques, you won't let him burn the shack. Jeanne is dying. We are alone. I am trying to save her for Gaspard's sake, but it seems hopeless."

The man looked incredulous. "Save her, and you love him!"

"That's why, don't you see—for him," cried the girl.

Jacques shook his head uncertainly. "I don't understand."

"You'll save them both, Jacques," begged Madelaine, "for my sake. It would be cruel, brutal murder. Gaspard isn't here; you must get Paul away. A shock would kill Jeanne instantly. There may be one chance in a thousand."

A flush mounted in Jacques' dark face and a light of triumph gleamed in his mocking eyes. "If you'll marry me next Spring," was his quick rejoinder.

Madelaine had nerved herself for this very demand. "Yes," she answered firmly, "I will."

She had never dreamed the cynical face could grow so gentle. His love for Madelaine was at least faithful and sincere. "Then adieu, little Madelaine," he whispered, drawing her close, "Don't look so sad. I'll call off Olier; He is bound to settle with Gaspard, but I know how to handle him."

All that night Madelaine kept constant vigil. It was long past daybreak when Jeanne roused suddenly and begged her to say a prayer and read something out of the book that the Protestant Priest had given her on his last flying visit. In a broken voice Madelaine obeyed, and as she read Jeanne slept again—the long dreamless sleep that smoothed the tired lines from her beautiful face and transfigured it with a calm, white radiance.

Just then there came a cheery hallo from the clearing and yelps of joy from Bijou. Gaspard burst into the room, glowing with youth and health, stamping the snow from his moccasins and peering with sun-blind eyes into the far corner by the fire-place.

Madelaine advanced toward him with her finger on her lips as he stood staring in dumb astonishment at the unexpected vision—his old playmate here at sunrise in this out-of-the-world spot, and with tears streaming down her pale cheeks. He half-extended his arms, then dropped them to his sides with a stifled groan. At his glance Madelaine's eyelids lowered and her heart bounded with wild exultation, for that glance spoke welcome and delight, and something that she had never seen there before. For a second only she felt that Paradise had opened, then she remembered—she had bought his life by her promise to Jacques Marquette.

GASPARD had already had ample time to repent at leisure. His infatuation for Jeanne had soon cooled beneath her sharp temper and inveterate selfishness. His brief married life had been a bitter disappointment. As the weeks had passed his disillusionment had been complete, and with it came the knowledge of what he had really wanted and had lost by his own stupidity and conceit. The sight of Madelaine seemed like a burst of sunshine in his cheerless home.

In a moment the girl was herself again. Silently she led Gaspard to the bunk where Jeanne lay with folded hands, the white radiance still on her face. With a cry the woodsman sank to his knees by the bedside and buried his face in his arms. Jeanne had seemed quite well when he left home, just a little cough. The shock was terrible.

Madelaine laid her hand gently on his bowed head. "She's all right now, Gaspard," she whispered. "It was pneumonia, but I was sent to take care of her. She suffered little, and now she is at rest."

Neither had heard the approach of the tall, bowed figure who entered silently and stood beside them. The Protestant Priest had suffered no little anxiety when Gaspard had limped away from his shack in the early morning hours and had felt impelled to follow him. A deep foreboding of evil was upon him as he traced the snow-shoe tracks to the woodsman's door.

Madelaine uttered a sigh of relief as she turned to find this mystic of the north woods standing beside them. His rugged strength and selfless sympathy could be counted upon at all times. In the benediction of his presence a strange sense of peace and security stole over her.

"My children," he said as the three knelt on the rough floor in a yellow shaft of sunshine, "the good God has spared her much suffering, for the White Plague had marked her for its own."

When Jeanne was laid to sleep beneath the whispering tamaracks with a white wooden cross to mark the spot, Madelaine and the missionary took up the long home trail to Blondeau. He had made everything so clear to both of them, and the path of duty and honor tho' not always pleasant, has compensations of satisfaction and a sense of well-being. Life had lost its glamor and romance, but there is always work to do.

It was Springtime in Blondeau, the gay glad Springtime when still, white lakes and rivers burst their icy chains and leaped blue and sparkling into the sunlight. The trappers were returning with their store of hard-earned treasures, and among the first came Gaspard, a little sad, a little grey, sobered by the tragedy of early winter.

As soon as the cottage lights began to glow like will-o'-the-wisps in the dusk, he made his way to the house on the fringe of the forest where Madelaine and her aunt sat by the evening lamp starting at every sound, dreading every passing footstep—for was not Jacques Marquette coming with the Springtime to claim his own.

Gaspard's knock brought them to their feet with startled gasps and a tragic exchange of glances. Madame Tascheraud moved slowly toward the door, giving her niece a moment to recover herself, then she flung it wide with a smile of welcome, for one must meet trouble with a brave front.

The smile changed to a joyous cry as Gaspard stepped across the threshold seizing both her hands and kissing her heartily on each rosy cheek. Next moment Madelaine was in his arms. "But there's Jacques," she sobbed, "I promised to marry him very soon. You must go, Gaspard, at once!"

Gaspard laughed as he drew a crumpled yellow envelope from his pocket and handed it to the girl. "Good news! Quick, read it."

It was from Jacques. Madelaine's face lighted with wonder and hope as she read. "Dear Madelaine—I'm not all bad—just a little devilish when I drink. You can be brave and give up all for love: so can I. I am married by the Protestant Priest to Marie Dubois, a half-breed girl from the Fort. She wants me, and you don't. Good luck to you, and to Gaspard for your sake—Jacques."

"After all he is a noble man," cried Madame Tascheraud.

"Next week I start for The Pas," announced Gaspard when the two women had laughed and cried over the letter in overwhelming relief. "In a year I will come for you, Madelaine. We must honor the memory of Jeanne. Then when we are married, the little new home in the great new land will be waiting, away from these scenes of sadness."

"Ah, that will make it easier for Jacques," murmured Madame Tascheraud, as she left the room. "In this Northland you find honor and chivalry where you least expect."

"No," answered his wife, "I'm not crazy. I've simply come to my senses. For more than thirty years you have dictated where we should live and how much money we should spend. Now it is my turn. To-night I looked up your rating with Bradstreet's. You are a wealthy man. Ever since the city began to grow you have been making money, and you have been turning it over and over and over, while I turned clothes and mended carpets. You have preached economy until I'm sick of the sound of the word. There is nothing you have not been willing to have me do. You even planned to let me live in Smith street in a wretched house in a wretched neighborhood. I've struck. I'll turn that option over to you when you have provided me with a proper house and arranged to pay me a fair allowance every month. That's final."

Without a word Mr. Winthrop sat listening to his wife. He seemed stunned by the suddenness of her attack. As the stinging sentences continued, something went out of his face, something conceited and cocksure and mean. He felt like a merchant ship attacked by a submarine, and he capitulated at once. He got up out of his chair.

"We have a house in Westpark listed," he said. "Put on your hat and coat and I'll take you over to see it now."

Mrs. Winthrop caught her breath. Westpark was the prettiest suburb in the whole city. She had never hoped to live there. She hurried into her bedroom. "I've won," her heart sang joyfully, "I've won."

Half an hour later a taxicab drove briskly along one of the loveliest streets in Westpark. It stopped in front of a little house, a quaint, little house set in a velvet lawn shaded by elm trees. There were awnings at the casement windows. There was a great stone chimney. There was a tiled porch and there was a beautiful sun room. Altogether it was the sweetest, cosiest little house one could possibly imagine.

As soon as she saw it, Mrs. Winthrop forgot the part she had to play, forgot the option, and the fact that her husband was at her mercy. She put a beseeching hand on his arm and lifted to him her tender, wistful eyes. "Why, it's the house I've dreamed of for years and years," she whispered. "If I owned it I would be the happiest woman in the world."

At the change in his wife's voice, Mr. Winthrop started. The sullen resentment melted from his face, and suddenly he felt again a surge of the old protective tenderness with which he had regarded her before the business of making money had driven everything else from his mind.

"I'll buy it for you, Margaret," he said eagerly. "You shall have your little house."

When they had examined their prospective home from cellar to attic, when Mrs. Winthrop had exhausted her superlatives and could only express her delight by silence, her husband remembered that there was still something about the option which he did not understand.

In the living room of the little house, with the light from its French doors shining on his rugged face, he asked diffidently. "Margaret, how DID you get that option? The old lady was like a terna-gant when I dared to mention it to her."

Mrs. Winthrop looked embarrassed. "She was sweet to me," she explained. "You see you had told me that she hated men, and when I told her about all our different houses, and about the way in which you expected me to move to Smith street, she said it would be worth giving up her cottage just to have me bring you to time. Besides I promised her a good price. You will have to give it to her, Will. She trusted me."

Feeling that in the last twenty-four hours, he had learned more about women than in the whole previous course of his married life, Mr. Winthrop mopped his glistening brow. "I never thought that women would help each other that way," he remarked. "From now on, I guess I shall have to watch my step."

Mrs. Winthrop laughed. "We've only begun to do it," she assured him happily. "We've only just found out how well it works."

AUTUMN LEAVES

By F. O. Call

*Upon the hills the crimson maples burn
And clumps of mountain-ash are all aflame;
In upland pastures the white birches turn
From green to gold, and make a glittering frame
Around blue patches of October sky;
For Death with soft cool hand has touched each bough,
And nestling to their mother soon must lie
The flaming leaves that flaunt their glory now.
And though on frost-browned hillsides, one by one
Their leaves are scattered by an unseen hand,
Unbowed and glowing in the autumn sun,
Facing the wintry dawn the brave trees stand,—
Great color symphonies that burn and glow
With beauty that the spring could never know.*

WIND OF AUTUMN

By L. M. Montgomery

*I walked with Wind of Autumn across the uplands airy,
Where canny eyes might hope to spy the little men in green,
By road of firs that should have led right on to lands of faery, Enchanted lands the sun and moon between.*

*We might have met the olden gods in those wild friendly spaces,
I think they peeped at us and laughed as we went on our way,
The little fauns and satyrs hid in all the haunted places
Where Wind of Autumn led me on that day.*

*The hemlock harp for music, immortal wine for drinking,
Oh, but we were rare good comrades, that gallant wind and I,
As hand-in-hand we wandered till roguish stars were winking
Between the scurrying cloudlets in the sky.*

*And oh, my sleep was sweet that night until the dawn came shyly,
And all the pretty dreams I had made haste to slip away,
For Wind of Autumn just outside was calling, calling slyly,
"Come with me for another spendthrift day."*

A Thanksgiving with Accidentals

BY EDWARD MOORE

Illustrated by Marion Long

"I'm just packing for my trip home to-morrow night."

"WHY all the rumpus? You're not leaving us?"

A sprightly girl of probably twenty burst impetuously and without knocking into the room next her own to see the occupant, a happy-looking young woman, probably a year or two older, bent over an open travelling-bag which stood on a chair near the dresser.

Joyce Wetherbee looked up from her packing just a bit roguishly.

"Jumping at conclusions as usual, eh, Beth," she noted. "No, I wouldn't go way from this house and you girls for a good deal. I'm just packing for my trip home to-morrow night. The train leaves at seven-ten so I have to go to the depot from the office."

"To-morrow night!" the comment came characteristically. "Oh dear. Then you won't be able to — Why, I just came in to ask you to be one of a party to jaunt over to Hollister's Knob on the holiday. We're planning to go over by trolley, have lunch at the hotel—the meals are dandy, they say—and perhaps hike back. The view from the mountain in the fall is simply superb. But of course . . ."

"It sounds splendid, doesn't it," the quieter girl said, turning to an open drawer of the dresser. "But I don't envy you that hotel lunch at all. For you see, with another of her roguish smiles, 'I'll have Thanksgiving dinner at home.'"

"Think of it, Beth!" She straightened up and stepped forward enthusiastically. "There'll be an eighteen-pound turkey. Dad and mother will have taken half an hour to-day to decide which one to kill to be good enough. Fatted calf for the prodigal, you see! And there'll be some sour onion pickles of mother's at one end and the sweet green tomato kind at the other. And there'll be little sausages inside that turkey with the onions and breadcrumbs. And the corn that mother does up on the cob so it comes out quite as good as the fresh kind. And the mince pie, and raspberry tarts with whipped cream on. And dad will insist that I have a second helping of everything and I'll eat like a little pig till I —"

"Stop! You're cruel. Stop it," protested the younger girl. "Did you remember that I had a wretched cafeteria dinner tonight? You've made me hungry again already."

"But," she went on again in a moment. "Is it worth it? You only have the one day. It's just a three-hour run out to my home at Petersburg and of course I go out sometimes when the holiday comes so I can make a week-end of it, but for one day — How far is it to Middleville?"

"Oh, it's a good distance. Nearly four hundred miles. And with only the one day it means two all-night runs. There was a shade of wistfulness creeping into the voice here.

"It makes a good-sized hole in one's weekly salary, too, with two sleeper fares to pay. But," the enthusiasm came back again with the change of thought, "it's worth it all, doubly worth it. Why think, Beth. I get off the Limited at Burling at six a.m., in the dark, and take the little three-car and engine local for forty miles. Then when we reach the little station six miles from home, just after the sun comes up, I look out and see father and Sam, my kid brother, or Alice the baby—though she's eleven now—waiting. Then there's that rush in the little car in the cool morning air, out to the farm, probably with Sam driving and father in the back seat with his arm around me—I tell you it's nice, too." This, as a flicker of a funny little smile ran across the listener's face.

"And there's mother at the door as we drive up the lane. And such a breakfast, with cream such as you people don't know anything about, on your cornmeal and thick ham home-cured, you don't know anything about that either—. You poor dear, as the city-bred girl simulated a grimace. "Am I making you hungry again?"

"To think of you, Joyce Wetherbee, private secretary to the Manager of the Billings Tool Company, raving like this," came the serio-comic comment. "Why, wasn't it only the other night on the way home from church I heard you tell that nice Peters boy that you liked the city awfully well?"

"And so I do," flashed the reply. "But, Beth," persistently getting back to the pet subject, "you know, these home things do get you once in a while. Why, after breakfast the neighbors will be calling on the phone. Everybody knows everything on those rural lines, you know. And I'm some important personage, let me tell you, to the people down there. Then there'll be the trip to the barn with dad to see the new calves and colts. And presently dinner with —"

"Yes, you told me all about that—once," interrupted the visitor with a mock expression of pain, at the same time rubbing a well-manicured hand over the section of her anatomy which is usually understood to harbor infantile sorrows.

"After dinner the aunts and uncles and cousins come in. And—"

"You get all the neighborhood gossip," broke in the irrepressible Beth.

"I guess you're right about that," Joyce admitted. "Though I do think it's kindlier than the way we talk about people here sometimes. And then," returning to the reminiscent stage, "there's the early supper and the rush back to the train. This time with father driving and mother in the back seat with Alice squeezed up close on the other side. And do you wonder, with all that," she looked up a little defiantly here, "that I haven't missed doing it a single Thanksgiving since I left home? That's five years ago."

Joyce, who held a reputation in the Billings Company as the "most efficient secretary Manager Potter had had," wondered whether there was any possibility that the one-day holiday might be stretched into two. But any faint hope was quenched when, after he finished his dictation, about three the next day, Mr. Potter said crisply:

"You may sign those for me, Miss Wetherbee. Please have them go out to-night. I have that special Directors' meeting at ten the morning after the holiday and will need that report you have been working with. You had better be ready, as well, to take the minutes of the meeting."

It took till nearly five to finish those letters. And there were some finishing touches to be put on the report. The young secretary glanced a bit anxiously at the manager's desk clock as she placed the document, in a folder, where his eyes would meet it readily.

"Gracious!" she said aloud. "I'll scarcely have time for dinner. Not much matter, though. I guess I'll make up for it to-morrow."

She did take time for a scanty supper at a nearby restaurant and then exulted a little in the unusual luxury of a taxi to the station. A few minutes later she was comfortably ensconced in her seat with a new magazine and a box of candy. She shared the section in the sleeping-car with a middle-aged lady who became interested in one of the magazine articles, who had travelled widely and who, as a good many such are prone to do, liked to talk about the places she had seen. It was quite eleven and a number of the other berths had been made up when the pleasant travelling companion caught Joyce involuntarily smothering a yawn.

"Poor dear," she said, apologetically. "When I get on these things I do run on interminably. I'm afraid I've kept you awake. You're fortunate, though," she went on, "to have a lower berth. I didn't decide till this morning to take this train and found everything sold out. The holiday travel, I guess. I only got this upper through a cancellation at the last minute."

Just then the shriek of brakes indicated a train-stop and a moment later a light sign flashed into view.

"Camlack," noted the lady, who was occupying the inside seat. "A divisional point. We'll be here at least five minutes. Did you ever try, my dear, a breath of fresh air before you try to sleep in these stuffy cars of ours? Suppose we take a walk up the platform while the train is standing."

Joyce did enjoy that three minutes in the cool, clear night air. It seemed, however, to banish the drowsiness and every sense was keenly alert as, ahead of her companion, she stood on the lower step watching the moving lights near the station.

In the vestibule above the good-natured porter of their car was speaking to one of the trainmen.

"Couldn't manage it nohow, Fred!" she heard in the colored man's soft drawl. "Ever bu'th's full up, some of 'em doubled-up. Besides mos' my people's asleep. I'll git yo' some mo' pillows. Yes, missy," he broke off, smiling, as Joyce climbed the steps, "Yo' bu'th's all ready. Win'ow open as yo' said."

The trainman spoke as Joyce waited for her section-mate. "She's pretty bad. Nerves all gone. Thinks if she could lie down she'd be better. The coaches are crowded, too. And there ain't a doctor on the train."

When Joyce offered her "lower" to Mrs. Maitland that good lady refused, noting in her characteristic way: "No, my dear. People who make arrangements ahead deserve to get what comfort they can from them. After trying to sleep in those wagon-lits in France I guess I can make out up there. Probably I had better say Good-bye, though, since I shan't be up to see you in the morning."

For the time-being Joyce had forgotten the impression which had been made by the trainman's statement outside. But it came back to her in her berth as she said her prayer with thoughts as usual of the people at home, of the girls of her own age in the friendly apartment-house back in the city, and of her class of little girls in the mission down in the less-desirable business section. And with the usual last petition:

" . . . help me to be truly thankful for all the good things I have, by trying to do something worth while for others . . ."

there came a persistent query: "I wonder what's wrong with the person back in the day coach?"

Joyce had travelled enough to be familiar with sleeping car usages so, without hesitation, she rang for the porter.

"Is some one ill back there?" she questioned, in a whisper, explaining: "I heard you talking to the brakeman in the vestibule."

"Yessuh, miss," came the black man's quiet, though a bit loquacious reply. "Lady in de day coach. Sick all evenin'. Pears to be nervous like. Fred, he wanted me to ask some gemmen give up his bu'th. Like to, but I dassen't. 'Gaint company rules. If I—"

The rest of the speech, if it was completed, was told to closed curtains.

Four minutes later a demure maiden in a dressing gown made her way forward into the day coach. She sniffed at the almost nauseatingly stale air but pressed on between the seats which looked empty but proved to be filled with recumbent figures, most of them male and some snoring vigorously. Near the front of the car was a lady—her refinement evident in the quiet gown and shapely, ringless hand which was pressed to her forehead—who was partially reclining with her head in a nest of pillows. That she was suffering intensely was evident from the drawn, white face and the twitching of the closed eyelids.

The friendly brakeman appeared, as she approached, carrying gingerly a cool wet cloth, and looked at her questioningly.

"I want her to have my berth," Joyce explained at once. "Lower seven in the car right behind. I didn't know of it till a few minutes ago."

The closed eyes opened long enough to give Joyce a grateful glance which was reward enough for any sacrifice she was making. The lady was apparently too ill to say anything.

That brakeman was a jewel. Fortunately, also, he was big and husky. He motioned Joyce ahead and, gently as one would handle a babe, picked up the sick woman and carried her back to the berth where, after the girl had loosened her clothing and removed her shoes, the sufferer relaxed with a long sigh indicative of comfort.

Joyce made her way, with her magazine to the ladies' dressing room, where, in a none too comfortable chair, which the porter had borrowed from the men's room, she finally dozed off.

She awakened with a start, heard a rumbling crash, and then experienced the horrible sensation of having the car move sideways while its forward motion was suddenly interrupted. She was tossed from her chair against the side of the car but got to her feet none the worse. The lights, fortunately still burning, showed that the car was tipped at a slight angle. Joyce, instinctively cool, glanced at her wrist watch which had not been removed.

"Ten to four," she said.

FOR breakfast that morning—the porter explained that the dining car had been dropped at Camlack—instead of the cornmeal and cream and—she had some chocolates from her box. By that time it had been discovered that a spread rail had been responsible for the wrecking of the train, every car of which had left the rails. Joyce had been out with Mrs. Maitland and had been rather horrified to see the engine and tender on their side at the bottom of a steep embankment and the cars spread skew-wise along the track. Their own sleeper was lying across the torn-up rails almost at a right angle, one end hanging unsupported over the same huge ditch. Fortunately there had been no serious casualties.

"Well," commented Mrs. Maitland. "I suppose we should be very thankful we're alive at all." She laughed when Joyce queried:

"Do you remember what day this is?"

A little later they learned from the kindly trainman that wrecking crews were on the way from divisional points in both directions but that it would likely be evening before the tracks were cleared and rebuilt.

"There'll be a special along a little after the wreck-train," he said, "to take you on to Burling. I'll let you know when it's here."

He came back after a few minutes. "If you ladies would like to send any wires one of the boys is going back to Delisle, the nearest station. Give 'em to George, the porter."

George produced pads of telegraph blanks and added the rather naive suggestion: "Won't matter how long you makes 'em. Course dey go at company's expense."

Joyce addressed hers to the chief operator in the Middleville telephone exchange, whom she knew slightly. She had not realized fully till then what the accident portended and a tear or two dropped while she wrote the following:

"Please 'phone my father, John Wetherbee, Rural Line Four, telling that accident to Limited near Delisle will prevent me getting home to-day. Assure him I am unhurt. Will likely be in Burling late this afternoon. Will try to 'phone him from there. Must take evening Express back."

For dinner they had some rough sandwiches and the diluted contents of a can of condensed milk, foraged by the porter from a mining camp back in the woods. Even this was interrupted by the call to the "special"—three worn-out cars and a wheezy locomotive—which pulled out jerkily at about two o'clock.

As they—the sick lady had been able to sleep when her nerves were not tortured by the motion of the train, was very much better and was naturally made one of the little party—finished the sandwiches and Joyce's candy she told them, smiling bravely, of her plans for the day as outlined to Beth at the bachelor girls' apartment two evenings before.

The "Special," delayed several times by weaknesses in the wheezy engine, pulled into Burling shortly after five.

"I'll run over to the telephone office," Joyce planned as she made her way out of the car. "Have a good talk with father and mother and the kids and then just have time for a nice dinner at the Burlington before I get the west express. If it weren't for that Directors' meeting to—"

The people on the steps behind were rather astounded to see the apparently reserved young lady impetuously drop her bag and wrap on the platform and rush headlong across to where a tall, bearded man was looking anxiously at the passengers from the other end of the car.

"Father—you!" she cried. "How in the world?" as with arms around his neck she pulled his head down to kiss him.

That night the larger box was opened—opened in the presence of five other bachelor girls.

Followed a rush around the end of the station and a long-legged small girl threw herself at the home-comer, while a slightly-older small boy, obviously uncomfortable in his Sunday clothes, stood off waiting a less exuberant welcome. Mother followed them closely and there were tears in her eyes as well as in those of the older daughter when father Wetherbee led the way back around the station to the parking space where a small car was standing.

"You dears!" Joyce commented, as they climbed into the car. "To think of you coming over that sixty miles through that bad clay on the mere chance of seeing me for even a minute. Oh I'm so thankful. And after I'd given up hope of anything but talking to you all by 'phone. It's almost better than the day I expected to have."

After a few minutes she asked: "Could I drive a bit, dad? I've been longing to get my hand on a steering wheel ever since summer but you know I don't ever get a chance in town. Do you remember the lovel road here you took me once, out around the city reservoir and the golf club? Could we? I can talk to you all the time."

When they got back, after the car was stopped several times to look and to talk, it was six-forty and the west express was due to leave in twenty minutes.

"Goodness, I'm glad there's a diner on this train," Joyce laughed happily, as she kissed mother good-bye. "Would you believe, mother-mine, that I haven't had a decent meal since yesterday noon. The dear sight of you all absolutely made me forget that I was hungry."

And this is Thanksgiving day—such a splendid Thanksgiving.

After she was settled in her section, alone this time, and was thinking about making her way to the diner, the porter appeared, looking around inquiringly. He carried two parcels, evidently boxes, one about a foot square, the other three times that size.

"Miss Wetherbee?" he asked, stopping beside Joyce. "Gentleman gave me these just when the train started. Asked me to tell you they had forgotten to give them to you."

On the cover of the smaller package was written in Alice's scrawly hand: "For To-night." The other, in smaller handwriting, somewhat like Joyce's own, and which she knew to be her mother's, noted: "Do not open until in your room."

"The dears!" Joyce said and whipped the cover off the smaller box almost voraciously.

Under the cardboard and tissue covering was a dainty white table napkin. Next oiled paper, which, being removed, exposed as Joyce knew it must—a drum-stick of that turkey, cut in convenient-sized pieces, likewise a slice or two of breast; some of the dressing with onions and sausages in it; two daintily-sized cobs of that corn, already buttered, and a tiny jelly jar of those sweet-tomato pickles. The box was divided by a cardboard partition. The other side revealed a quarter of the mince pie and two of the raspberry tarts. Underneath this were packed three of the rosy apples from the favorite tree in the back pasture.

"I guess this is where I become the little pig all right," Joyce commented to herself.

FIVE minutes before ten next morning, while Joyce was arranging pads and pencils around the big table in the Directors' room at the office, a gentleman who looked severe but who proved to be anything but that, came into the room with Manager Potter, who was smiling a little more than usual.

"Miss Wetherbee," the Manager said. "Mr. Appleton,"—he paused a moment till he noted that Joyce recognized the name as the big man, the newly-appointed director, whose name and financial strength the company had been eagerly seeking for some time—"Mr. Appleton specially asked if he might meet you. I'll be on the lookout," walking back to his office, "for the other men."

"I called my wife by long distance last night," the big man began, holding Joyce's hand just a shade longer than she wanted, "when I heard about the wreck on the P. & Q. And she told me about the charming young lady who gave up her berth and helped her during the excitement of the accident. She hadn't your name quite right but she knew you worked in a manufacturing office and had to be back in town here for a directors' meeting this morning and she wondered whether it was the same meeting I was to attend. She asked me to thank you better than she had done, if it were. I've just been making inquiries of Potter yonder and while he didn't know you were out of town, he says it must have been you. Says you'd be efficient anywhere, even in a railway accident. You must have made a strong impression on Mrs. Appleton," he went on. "And that is all the more notable when I tell you that she doesn't make friends easily. She expects to be back on Saturday morning and particularly wanted me to ask you to come out and spend the week-end with us."

That night the larger box was opened. Opened in the presence of five other bachelor girls who for once refrained from the usual cafeteria dinner. It revealed an assortment very similar to the smaller box though in more abundance and in somewhat greater variety. And there were six "little pigs" grunting in their own way for some time thereafter.

"A week-end at the Appleton's!" Beth exploded when Joyce told them of the morning's experience. "You're certainly in luck, sister. I saw their place the other night. It's among those big houses up the river with big trees and lawns in front and boathouses and things. They say, too, this with a roguish wink at one of the other girls, "there's a young Appleton, the apple of his mother's eye, who's following his father in business. Some Thanksgiving for you. I'll say, even though you didn't have a meal for a whole day, and travelled eight hundred miles not to get home."

"Of course that part of it is all right," Joyce commented, smiling. "I'm properly thankful for that. But," becoming serious again, "I am really and truly thankful for the day. For the home I've got even though I can't live there. For the father and mother who do things for me like this—waving a hand over the country-made dinner. "For the kiddies back there who like to see me. Oh," this even more earnestly, "I'm thankful, too, for the life I live which makes me appreciate these things and even railway smash-ups when they show how much your home people love you."

In Choosing Pictures for a Child's Room

BY MARION LONG

IN selecting pictures for a child's room one is doing more than merely decorating the walls. Just as the books with which a child becomes familiar determine to a large extent his future taste, whether it will be for really good literature or for mere popular trash, so the type of picture he continually has before him will affect his attitude towards works of art for years to come.

Really good pictures like fine poetry, will appeal to the sense of the beautiful,—that sense which can bring such pure pleasure, such unexpected joy, and can is laughable, her high collars ridiculous and the length of her skirts—well, no smartly dressed miss of to-day would be seen with "such a dowd." Poor magazine-girl! Beyond her fashion of the day she had nothing that would survive the torrent of change that comes with the years; but when we turn to some of the old masters, like Rembrandt, we find something quite different. Instead of laughing at the queer clothes, we are interested in the woman herself. One feels that she has lived and experienced the usual lot of humanity—she has known that is to be found in every work of art; but there is much more than that. In order to express what has aroused his emotions, the artist uses form, design and color. As this worthiness of idea with the beauty and rhythm of the means of expression are, together, what constitute a great work of art, it is a pity one hears so little stress laid on the second part when pictures are being discussed with children. A very little explanation will start a child's mind in the right direction, and he will begin to appreciate the beautiful way in which the subject is arranged on the canvas with its sense of balance, rhythm of line and its glory of color,—a much deeper way of enjoying pictures than just looking for a story or an over-exact imitation of some familiar thing. Study the picture yourself and explain it to the child, in this way making it a thing to be looked at carefully and to be thought about, not something to be taken as part of the furnishings, and passed over as such. Not long ago, I showed a copy of Whistler's portrait, "My Mother," to a small boy, asking, "Do you like it?" "But why do you like it?" I queried when he answered in the affirmative. "Oh,

I don't know—I think because—well, it looks like a very old person just resting." And where could you find a better appreciation. Then we talked for a while about the big, dignified mass of the figure, the peaceful quality of the wall with the simple spots of the light pictures with their black frames, the straight lines of the baseboard and the long folds of the straight hanging curtain and this boy of ten listened eagerly, realizing something of the dignified beauty of this picture's composition.

BUT as well as charm of composition there is the beauty of color with all its subtle influence to which we are so quick to respond. Good pictures will bring the child examples of exquisite combining and contrasting of colors, will cultivate his taste for pure and glowing shades, and teach him to appreciate those delicate gradations of the more neutral tints. And added to this they will open his eyes to the ever-lasting miracle of the changing color in the world around him.

set one "standing tip-toe on the misty mountain tops." In this work-a-day world where the mere material business of living tends to force all our dreams and fine fancies into the background, it is something worth cultivating, surely,—that possibility of escaping into a land of our own where the beautiful becomes ours through the power of appreciation.

Keeping this in mind, one should be sure, in choosing a painting, that it has some idea worth expressing—something beyond the superficial and trivial. There are innumerable pictures that have a surface appeal, showing as they do, what is popular or "smart" at the present moment, but like the fad they express, before long "something new" will come to the fore and the picture, like its subject, will be pushed into the background and forgotten. Take, as a very obvious instance, that ever popular favorite, the girl on the magazine cover. What charm do we see in the type of ten years ago? Her hair-dressing joy and sorrow—and, by our understanding of these things written on her face we know that mere fashion of dress is an external and unessential thing. In one case the artist has chosen a superficial view of his subject, in the other, the painter's thoughts are as deep as life itself.

* * *

IF your choice is a landscape remember the power of nature, her moods of anger and joy, the might of the storm and the peace of the clear sunny day, the infinite variety and continual change that is around us all the time and don't degrade the wonder of it all by allowing yourself to think it is expressed by some pretty or "sweet little bit." Out-of-doors, even in her sweetest moods has an underlying strength that can never be quite hidden and can never be expressed by weak sentimentality.

So far we have thought only of the dominating idea or essential characteristic

Fredericton—the Celestial City

BY KATHERINE HALE

WHAT a pleasant little place!" says the traveller, looking down from a hill-top at Fredericton, lying all blue and gold in the sun, encircled by her hills and rivers.

"A town of historic interest," affirms the student, and backs the remark with data.

"Fredericton the Celestial City!" cries the poet. And it is the poet's Fredericton that combines all three.

What the traveller sees is a peaceful yet thriving place, the Cathedral City and Capital of New Brunswick, the military centre of the Province, the seat of the Supreme Judiciary and of the Provincial University. He knows that it is also a centre of lumber trade, and a tourist's Paradise because of good roads, good fishing, and the joys of motor-boating.

The historian harks us back to the days of Villebon, when the site of the present city was a small Acadian settlement called St. Anne's Point. It was an Indian camping place as well, and down the St. John came the canoes of the Melicites piled with beaver skins. They came to trade with the gentlemen adventurers of France. Villebon, Governor of all happy state that seems to mark this community as a thing apart from the usual scramble of modern life.

* * *

IN a charming account of his early home written by Charles G. D. Roberts years ago, and never before

Speaking of the Public Buildings on Queen Street, Mr. Roberts observes the severe gray pile of the Barricks where the men drill behind high walls, "that the glints of their scarlet may not bedazzle the passing demoiselles."

"The favorite residence portion of the City is within clear call of the Cathedral bells. Here are most of the handsome houses and the well kept grounds. Below the Cathedral, where the street runs close to the water's edge, where the bank is lined with willows, where rafts tie up at night along the shore, and where the houses all look out across the river, there stands a dwelling which should be dear to many American hearts. The author of 'Lob-Lie-by-the-Fire' and 'The Story of a Short Life' is beloved of her countrymen. This plain brown house, with the bow windows and the river view, is full of memories of Juliana Horatia Ewing who lived here while her husband, a Major in an English regiment, was stationed at Fredericton. Another guest not so highly distinguished lived a few hundred yards below Mrs. Ewing's house—Benedict Arnold, great General and great traitor. At the creek's mouth near his house he built small vessels for the river trade."

But the house best known and loved by Canadians in general, naturally within clear call of the Cathedral bells, was the Rectory of the Cathedral, a quaint red brick house now famous as the Roberts homestead. Here lived the Rev. George Goodridge Roberts, Canon of Christ Church Cathedral, with his wife Emma Wetmore Bliss, and here Charles G.D., the eldest son, a daughter, Elizabeth, now Mrs. S.A.R. MacDonald, Theodore Goodridge, a younger brother, and Bliss Carman, a cousin, all grew up in the happy atmosphere of the Rectory. Just recently, in the "Christian Science Monitor" of Boston, I came upon a charming glimpse of these festal youthful days at the Rectory, during the time of its occupation by the Roberts family, written by a grandson of the house who has inherited the literary bent of the family.

LOYD ROBERTS says: "It is any day, any month of the year—for what are seasons among friends?—when word goes round among the Clan that the Rectory is entertaining. That means four hours of undiluted joy, of unrestrained exuberance, a democracy of action that sets aside little differences and tumbles everyone helter skelter into the common basket of enjoyment. There is no master of ceremonies. Possibly the youngest and noisiest—probably yourself—shouts for 'My ship came home from India,' and the evening is off to a glorious start. How the dust flies from the flowered carpet and the black horsehair sofa! How the knickknacks tremble on whatnot and mantle! How the framed pictures of the animals disembarking from the ark and of Abraham offering up Isaac sway on their wires until they hang askew!... And this is the drawing-room where one came and went sedately on ordinary week days, careful not to disarrange furniture or leave a cushion awry. Grandpa's explosive gusts, that would have shaken walls less thick, are topped by shrieks and children's trebles until all is pandemonium and the neighbors, half a block off, shake their heads sympathetically over their knitting."

Mrs. C. F. Fraser has also written a delightful account of the Rectory in the days of "dear Rector Roberts," as he was affectionately called by the town. "He was," Mrs. Fraser tells us, "a scholarly gentleman of old English descent. Of winter evenings the favorite gathering place was about the great centre table in the sitting-room, where the young people were wont to read aloud for each other's amusement the rhymes or stories which the day had called forth. In summer weather the great old-fashioned garden, haunt of all fragrant and time-honoured flowers, was the favorite spot. There in and about the hammocks with their cousin, Bliss Carman, extending his great length on the turf below, and shaggy Nestor

A general view of Fredericton, the capital which Bliss Carman called, "that leafy northern city."

The historic Roberts rectory

Acadia, made the fort just opposite St. Anne's at the Nashwaak's mouth his citadel, in place of the abandoned Fort Royal.

No one pretended to look for peace in those days. If it was not the Indians it was the New Englanders. Villebon had a certain "old Ben Church" and his fleet of New England vessels to fight. But the Nashwaak guns were too many for them.

Generations later the Loyalist immigrants built St. John, and in 1786 New Brunswick became a Province. The first Governor, Thomas Carleton, must have remembered the ancient prowess of St. Anne and her invincible fort, for he made Fredericton its capital, and in a little building still standing near the present Queen's Hotel, known as the King's Provision Store, the General Assembly met for its third session in July 1788.

Two years before, the first sermon ever preached in the settlement was delivered here. It was remarked by the Rev. Samuel Cooke, the Rector, two years later, that the inhabitants of Fredericton number four hundred, "of whom one hundred attend church, but many of ye common sort prefer to go fishing."

The Celestial city of the poet includes all that the historian knows and all that the traveller sees. That vivid background, Indian haunted and pierced by the conquering note of the French, sharpens his imagination but he also feels the poetry in his City of to-day.

The shimmering waters that surround it, rimmed by the green hills, suggest to him certain celestial qualities, but if he knows his Fredericton the aspects of repose are not only those of a mellowed natural beauty. They imply a life of leisured intellectual pursuit, an unhurried, published, the well-known poet and short story writer describes the beautiful setting of Fredericton, "Drawn about her," he says, "is the broad and gleaming crescent of the St. John and opposite to her wharves the lovely tributary streams, the Nashwaak and the Nashwaaksis."

To look over the City from the cupola windows of the University buildings, across Queen's Park and the spires of the church steeples, piercing the elm tops half a mile away, is to let the eye wander far. Beyond that there is the blue sweep of the river and the white villages of St. Mary's and Gibson, and further still the town of Marysville where the Lumber King, Alexander Gibson, holds sway. The great river itself is often dotted with the sails of wood boats. To quote Mr. Roberts again "Here and there puffs a neighboring tug, towing an acre or two of dark rafts, or a gang of scows piled high with yellow deals. On all sides is evidence that Fredericton is the centre of the lumber industry. The scene is one that fills the eye with gracious color and harmonious composition. In the Autumn when the trees flame out with amber and scarlet and aerial purple, when the air swims with a faint violet haze the picture is one that neither the painter's brush nor the poet's pen can do more than dimly suggest."

There is indeed a gentle charm everywhere. I remember the overhanging elm trees, which it seems to me should be part of every Cathedral town. The Cathedral itself though small and plain to the point of austerity is one of the most perfect examples of Gothic architecture on the continent. Queen Street with shops on one side and lawns and trees and river glimpses on the other is equally typical of tranquil Fredericton

TO prolong the pleasure of independent home-coming, the first she had ever tasted in a considerable lifetime, Malvina Leed paused upon her small doorstep to admire her two acres with lenient leisureliness before fitting the key into the lock.

"Not much of a farm," she commented in high good-humor while a glow of rosy content overrode the look of pale suppression habitual to her countenance. "But it's all mine!"

This last came in a furtive whisper, as if she had good reason for supposing she might not be permitted to exult long if she exulted too audibly.

"Nor much of a house, either!" This second damaging admission seemed to afford her a satisfaction even more rapturous than the first. She literally trembled with pleasure as she turned the key and pushed open the door. Key, door, house, all were new to her, and the entertainment of the moment was immense.

Her usually exacting nostrils sniffed enjoyingly even the lifelessness of the air which crept out to her,—that subtle atmosphere of barren unwelcome which exhales from an untenanted dwelling.

Just as she had mustered sufficient audacity to make a possessive entrance, her mature but childish expectant face clouded with a panicky concern.

"Joey told me most particular to do something with the key, and what it was I clean forget. 'Twas either to hang it on a nail—or slip it on my key-ring—or—he'll be that annoyed!"

Then, the frown of concern turned to a frown of protest, and it grew courageously till it obliterated completely her subservient attempts to recollect. This frown marked absolutely the first rebellion in all her rather harassed, and decidedly excitable, married life against the dictating precaution of her extremely executive husband. With a nod of defiance she let the key take chances and dropped it among the bewildering miscellany of a capacious pocket.

"Why should I not do what I like with my own key and in my own house, too?" she muttered, sternly. She felt that sternness was necessary. Her resoluteness needed severity in order to be operative.

Malvina Learns to Play House

BY MARION HILL

"My house!" The unusual words brought a smile to her lips. "Only three rooms—but all mine!" Again the lowering of her voice as if there were danger in a too audible expression of content. "Mine,—like the land."

Mingling with this inconsequential exultation, but without any depreciating effect, Malvina had a common-sense knowledge that her "inheritance" was almost valueless viewed as real estate.

Subconsciously, this knowledge gave security to her enjoyment. If her property were not worth possessing, perhaps no one would bother to interfere with her management of it. "No One's" name was—Joey.

The tiny place had come to her not long ago through the death of a relative. It was at that time being used as a summer home by a young married couple who had now gone back to the city,—gone, as summer visitors generally do, at the most gorgeous season of the year, in rich October, red with turning woods and plenteous with garnered harvests.

"And, Mally, you'd better hurry there at once and see what you've reely got," had been Joey's dictum. So of course she had hurried. She allowed Joey to plan her life down to the most trivial detail, not that she was incapable of doing it as well and better, but that it infinitely saved trouble to let Joey run as far as possible all of the universe that was not directly under the hand of its Creator.

So patiently had she submitted herself, and for so many years, that sheer habit had kept her from realizing how impatient she was and always had been of his all-prevailing assertiveness. Nor until she stepped within this little kingdom of her three-roomed house did she discover how needlessly thorough he had been in his persistent thwarting of her harmless preferences.

"If there isn't a table in the middle of the sitting room!" she cried, and a flush of gratification intense enough to be pathetic in its inconsequent connection burned in her excited cheeks. "Now, isn't that cosy? Ma always had hers in the middle. Seems as if I never could see the use of a table up against a wall. It kind of wastes one side of it. I'm so glad the table's in the middle!"

In Joey's house—and hers,—if she could ever bring herself to feel ownership in anything so aggressively controlled by her partner,—nothing was ever in the middle of a room. Joey was large of bulk and resistlessly progressive and during progressions objected to hitting projecting portions of his anatomy against corners of furniture. He therefore arranged his belongings inexorably close to his walls, keeping his rooms as unobstructed at center as fighting rings,—which they often were.

Malvina walked around and around her table in ecstasy, gathering additional comfort from the fact that it was covered with a fringed cloth. Tablecloths irked Joey considerably, being in the way of free distribution of ashes from his pipe, and fringed tablecloths were utterly tabooed, fringe having aptitude to entangle in Joey's buttons with disastrous outcome as concerned Joey's temper.

Weaning herself from the table, Malvina went to the window, ran up the shade, raised the sash, gleefully surveyed her scant acres from this new vantage and gloried in her sole big apple tree just discovered at the back.

"Cayuga reds!" she murmured, and her calm blue eyes grew wistfully eager. She mourned because the apples were out of reach. She ached to handle one, hers, off her farm. Just here the muslin curtain blew against her cheek and awoke a new train of rapturous sensations.

"Sash curtains!" she cried with another flush of exceeding pleasure as she ran a welcoming hand up and down their starchy smoothness. Joey was not sympathetic in the direction of sash curtains, holding that they harbored dust and obstructed the light, and he invariably emphasized his theories by twisting into unsightly ropes or rolling into damaged wads such curtains as Malvina ventured upon from time to time.

"Have the other rooms sash curtains, too?" wondered Malvina, letting her expectations broaden audaciously.

Exploration happily proved that her hopes had not betrayed her. Both kitchen and bedroom were whitely curtained and the curtains moved gently in the draft as if they were sentient things and waved their friendliness toward her. The bedroom appealed strangely,—it beckoned like a sanctuary,—so quiet and dim it was, so spotless and uncluttered, so free from pipes and boots and whip-thongs and earth-stained overalls. Except for the bureau and the bedstead, the small room contained nothing but a rocking chair and a table only large enough to hold a reading lamp and a book, yet the apartment seemed spaciousness itself to Malvina. It was as wide as—freedom.

She stole from it reluctantly, wooed away only by the magnitude of her interest in her possible kitchen ware. Those utensils were few, but eminently satisfying in their state of newness and cleanliness.

"Brides is the least messy people to live after as ever I see," admitted Malvina, as she entrusted to the glass cupboard the wisp of tea, the loaf of bread and the pat of butter which she had thriftily brought with her to serve as supper and breakfast. Her proposed stay overnight was practically enforced, for the return trains were inconvenient in hour, one being too early in the morning, the other too late at night, to permit

THE YEAR 'ROUND PORCH

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

SOMEONE has very aptly said that the luxuries of one generation become the necessities of the next—and, by way of substantiation, we need but turn to the increasing popularity of the enclosed, or "year 'round," porch. Although the practice of enclosing a porch to make it suitable for use during even the coldest weather may be in part attributed to our desire to continue through the Winter at least a suggestion of Summer outdoor life, it can in some measure be viewed as a democratic outgrowth of the plutocratic conservatory or "plan room" of a former generation.

The conservatory was, of course, not used as an auxiliary living room: it was, rather, frequently attached to a house merely as a badge of the owner's social and financial status. Damp, cheerless and often far from sanitary as the home conservatory was, it, nevertheless, inspired the palm room, which flourished a couple of decades ago. The palm room, while intended to promote the cultivation of flowers and plants, was usually so furnished, that it could be used as a sunny sitting room. Notwithstanding this concession to creature comfort, the palm room—perhaps because its very name savored so of opulence!—never was anything but a luxury of the very rich.

In the meantime, however, there was a growing appreciation of the porch—or, as it was then more generally known, the veranda or piazza. The contour of the porch was gradually altering to facilitate more general use and more livable furnishing. Thus, it was but a natural phase of evolution when the quondam palm room and the popular open veranda were merged into the year 'round porch as we know and value it today.

Best of all, too, the year 'round porch is no longer a luxury: it is almost a necessity in any new home—and, thanks to the adaptability of sash-enclosures!—even our older houses need not be lacking in this essentially modern adjunct.

It is, as a general rule, more satisfactory to remove than to retain the railing of an existing porch when erecting either a temporary or a permanent enclosure. Otherwise, the railing has to be backed or faced by solid boarding, then topped by some form of sill as a footing for the sash: and, of course, the established height of the railing tends to retard any individuality of design in the sash and eliminates the possibility of having the glass continuous from floor to ceiling.

On the other hand, in planning a new enclosed porch, there is an unrestricted field in the matter of design and construction. The outer walls can, for instance, be entirely given over to groupings of the familiar double-hung variety of window, which is weather-tight and convenient. Outward-swinging casements are equally suitable; more especially for the porch-enclosure of permanent character. Inward-swinging casements, too, are often used—but not always satisfactorily, as they are exceedingly hard to render water-tight. To counterbalance this disadvantage, however, they are notably easier than the outward-swinging casements to either screen or drape.

An enclosed porch does not fulfil its specific mission unless the ratio of glass to solid wall be properly balanced. Indeed, the more nearly the outer walls are given over to glass, the more cheerful the porch will prove during the Winter months, when abundant sunlight is a veritable boon within-doors. If, however, the enclosure is to be of a temporary character, the individual sash should be neither too large nor too heavy for convenience in assembling and disassembling. Preferably, too, the sash should be made up of many small panes, rather than of large, single sheets of glass: for the latter have a tendency to destroy balance in architectural design; to emphasize the porch and minimize the body of the house of which it forms a part. Naturally, the smaller units of glass are also the more economical, as any breakages can be replaced expeditiously and inexpensively.

When the enclosing of a porch was first inaugurated, it was not very seriously considered by either architects or interior decorators. Neither they nor the average home owner apparently seemed to sense the unique artistic possibilities of an enclosed porch as a quasi-garden room; a place where the formality of the house might appropriately be modified by the always-graceful informality of the world outdoors. As a result, practically nothing in the nature of elaborate wall-adornment was attempted at the outset; nor was there even an effort put forth to harmonize the new enclosing walls with the structural material of the house walls.

Now, however, the inner walls of a permanently-enclosed porch are usually uniformly plastered, either in a smooth or a sand-float texture. The rough-surfaced plaster is frequently left in its natural coloring, which is grayish in tone: but it is even more often tinted or painted. Paint, too, is a favorite finish for the walls of smooth plaster, as it is easy to care for or renew.

WITH the plastered walls as a background, delightful effects attend the use of slender wooden strips arranged to form an all-over lattice. In one enclosed porch, where the walls are of light gray sand-float plaster, a trellis of delicate design painted in a soft shade of terra cotta extends from the floor to the ceiling; and, at its base, are low jars of the same warm coloring filled with English ivy, that will in time clothe the trellis with verdure. In another instance, nasturtiums trail over a latticework that is painted burnt orange to contrast with walls of old ivory. In still another case, walls, ceiling and trellises are finished in a blue that is almost green: and, in one enclosed porch which is used as a breakfast room, the lattices are painted white to match the other woodwork and the walls.

Lattices, of course, are usually viewed as accessories intended for outdoor use alone: but their appearance in an enclosed porch is entirely logical when the intimate relationship which the room bears to the garden is duly considered. And, in any event, were their use quite illogical, the lattices would both deserve and richly repay recognition because of their wonderful efficacy as a decorative feature when used within-doors.

Although wood as a porch flooring material is not at all likely to be completely supplanted in public favor, there Dominated by a great stone fireplace and equipped with sash extending from floor to ceiling, this enclosed porch is marked by the utmost simplicity in its furnishing. The hardwood floor is covered with a Scotch wool reversible rug in two shades of grayish-green. Several pieces of antique mahogany furniture are used to relieve the comfortable wicker furniture, which is painted a quiet gray-green to harmonize with the rug. The chairs are cushioned in a light gray cretonne that is patterned in American Beauty red, dull green and tan. Several cushions in plain American Beauty red give interesting spots of color and sundry bits of prized pewter and copper adorn the mantel, above which a small deer's head is appropriately hung.

A cream to give your skin a special freshness and really hold the powder

Only a cream that your skin can absorb will give it that clear fresh look in an instant

SOMETHING to make the skin look its best at a moment's notice. Every woman wants to know about it.

Something that will actually make your skin feel and look softer and smoother the moment you apply it.

Only a cream that your skin can absorb will do this instantly. This cream is Pond's Vanishing Cream—made of ingredients famous for their soothing effect on the skin and by a formula that combines these ingredients in such a way that the cream is absorbed immediately.

Always before you go out or whenever you want to appear especially well, smooth on a little of this light cream. You will notice the moment you apply it to your cheeks what a freshened feeling it gives you. That tired look disappears and your skin looks clear—it will feel firm and rested.

It is indispensable for evening use as it makes your skin look its best immediately.

How many times, especially when you were dancing, you have wished your face would not get shiny and that the powder would stay on!

Why powder does not stay on longer

Powder put directly on the skin does not stay. Too much of it clings in spots. Some of it catches on little rough places and soon flecks off leaving your face shiny again. This roughness of the skin's surface is often so slight you cannot see it, but it prevents the powder going on smoothly.

Try powdering after you have used Pond's Vanishing Cream—the soft velvety surface it gives your skin forms the ideal powder base. The cream cannot reappear in a shine as it contains no oil. The powder goes on evenly and stays on for hours.

No one cream, however, can contain all the properties necessary to keep your skin in perfect condition. For thorough cleansing you need a cream with an oily base, the very property that is impossible in a vanishing cream. Pond's Cold Cream has just the necessary amount of oil.

Use both these creams every day. They cannot clog the pores or promote the growth of hair. You can get them in jars or tubes of convenient sizes at any drug or departmental store, at 50 cents each. The Pond's Extract Co., Toronto, Can.

A totally different cream for thorough cleansing

Unless your skin is kept thoroughly clean it will become dull or muddy looking. Dust and fine particles of dirt bore deep into the pores—too deep for ordinary washing to remove. If you allow this deepest dirt to stay, blackheads may form.

Every day your pores collect this dirt. When you take a dusty railroad or motor trip they collect more than usual. To remove every trace of dirt and grime you must use a good cold cream with just the necessary amount of oil—Pond's Cold Cream. This delicate cream is very light to the touch, it is snowy-white—no greasy smell—altogether delightful to use.

Every night and whenever you come in from a dusty trip, smooth this cream into your face. It will work its way into your pores and out again bringing every bit of dirt with it. Then wipe your face gently with a soft cloth—you will be astonished at the grime and realize what a thorough cleansing this cream has given you.

Pond's Cold Cream was designed not only to cleanse thoroughly but to keep your skin supple. The oil in this cream lubricates your skin and keeps it firm and supple so that wrinkles do not form.

Be careful never to use a cream with too much oil for such creams clog the pores. Creams that are too stiff stretch them. Pond's Cold Cream has just the right amount of oil to stimulate your skin and keep it looking youthful.

THERE might be an article written on "the things we leave behind us." I am of the opinion that we usually find time for the things that we really wish to do and that we seldom leave behind the article in which we are deeply interested. The report recently published by Montreal hotels concerning the things which people leave behind them is an interesting revelation of human tastes and sense of values. Never, say the hotel authorities, is a powder puff left behind, no matter how much in a hurry Milady may be. She knows, to a nicety, just where her vanity box and all things pertaining to it may be, and will forget her pocket book or a war bond, rather than her treasured powder puff. There is evidence that man does not often forget his wig or his razor; so, we may conclude that an amiable vanity belongs to the race.

There is no denying that our grandmothers, also, were not above the small arts which lend themselves to beautifying; but they were more reticent about the manner in which they practised these arts. Go to the Royal Ontario Museum in Toronto and you will find how ancient is the mirror and how enduring the little alabaster box which held the rouge of long ago.

THE "going back to school" is now almost a month old, the new books have been bought and the new class-mates properly placed. The boys and the girls who have passed into a higher form have lost their first shining sense of importance; while those who failed are determined to get a "pass" next summer.

Do you remember how important you felt when you had entered the High School, and how infinitely condescending you were to the young persons whom you had left behind you? Never, never again will come quite the thrill which was yours when you became a pupil in the High School and entered upon the study of French and Geometry.

Then, there are the girls who have just gone away to boarding school. I must admit that I have a great liking for the "girls' school." It is really more fun than all the co-education in the world and some day Canada will be rich enough to afford women's universities and we shall have something "for women only" to approach Wellesley College and Smith. I am afraid that it will be many moons before we shall have anything so good as Bryn Mawr. By the way, perhaps you do not know that one of the most widely known professors at the famous Vassar—Dr. Louise Cummings—is a Canadian, a former Hamiltonian. Her department is no less than mathematics.

THERE is hardly a Canadian artist or a poet who has not painted or sung the charms of October. England seems to revel in the spring-time and to find her supreme joy in April with its foam of flowers; but Canada has a rare pride in October, with its warm richness of coloring. Someone from the West utters a word of protest here and says: "You should see Victoria in April!—there's an English spring for you."

By the time you read this—if you have leisure for teacup tinkling—October will be here, with its crimson and its woodland brown—and it will be autumn, indeed. To-day, as I am writing, it is early September, a day of pure gold, with a cloudless sky, yet with that haze on the horizon which tells of the approach of the Fairy of the Frost. There is a wealth of color everywhere, in fruit and flower and foliage. This is a delectable room, furnished in an Old Country fashion, with old tables and sturdy chairs, some of which have certainly crossed the Atlantic. Just beneath the mirror, above the mantel, there is a flaming cluster of nasturtiums, with the green stems showing their cool curves through the clear glass. Near the window, there is a huge Belgian blue bowl filled with asters, mauve, pink and crimson. Another bowl of blue, near the foot of the stairway, holds a golden wealth of zinnias, while marigolds show their smiling sunburnt faces above the lemon-yellow brim of a fat little bowl on the table near me. Who can write sober paragraphs, with such intoxicating color all around this writing table? The room, itself, belongs to a transformed carriage-house in the country, part of an enterprising woman's undertaking. Years ago, a farm house was bought, a porch was added, rooms were re-decorated and furnished and an old-fashioned inn was made, with a name which had walked out of "Martin Chuzzlewit," and china to match the name of the hostelry.

A few years went by, and so successful was the inn that the Lady of the Land decided to retire from the busy scene and transform the carriage-house near into a habitation for her household and for the wayfarer who wished the joys of country life within reach of a comfortable inn. So it comes that it overlooks, from a green distance, a busy road where all Ontario whirls by—and not a few travellers from the south—and it affords a refreshing shelter for day or week or month to the city-tired sojourner.

The inn is rented to a host who knows his business and the Lady of the Land owns a cottage and a rural "duplex", in addition to the inn and the House of Tranquility. There are ever so many women in this country who are talking vaguely about how they would "just love" to manage such an enterprise. Here is one who has quietly gone to work and succeeded. It has meant years of planning and toil, but the labor has been worth while for herself and for others.

Everywhere in the House of Tranquility, there are soft colors and restful scenes, with no suggestion of the strife and turmoil of the near-by city. After days of wandering in grassy by-ways and surveying the early-autumn beauty of woods and gold-fringed roads, who would not sigh for a cottage, with pines and birch and maple in the background and a glowing mountain ash before the door?

Making the Boy Musical

By Hector Charlesworth

I have been asked to say something on the question of how to interest boys in music, and I confess that the topic is a rather baffling one. Unquestionably there have been immense advances in musical appreciation among the Canadian public within recent years, but it is doubtful whether there are as many boys in proportion to the population taking music lessons as there were forty years ago. I am speaking particularly of the smaller towns. In the larger cities somewhat different conditions, which I shall presently deal with, exist.

I suppose there was always a latent sentiment among boys that music was a girl's accomplishment, and therefore to be spurned by the haughty masculine mind. And then boy-life as distinguished from girl-life, evokes a much stronger social pressure against music-practice than exists in the case of sisters. How detestable, even to the boy of moderate musical temperament, is the thought of abandoning some juvenile expedition or a ball match on the back lot in order to go and practice the piano! The percentage of boys that are started on music lessons only to drop them, because of the disgust of parents at their lack of application must be very large indeed. Quite as large is the percentage of grown men who now lament either that they never had a chance to take music lessons, or that, given such a chance, they deliberately frittered it away.

One of the notable factors in music at the present time is the growth in the numbers of masculine concert-goers. No longer can it be said, as it once was, that musical events are attended only by the wives and daughters; the husbands and fathers to be seen at any ordinary concert have notably increased within the recollection of most of us. By many, regret that they do not know more about music is frequently expressed; while others find the little music knowledge they may have picked up in boyhood, before they kicked over the traces and refused to practice, a pleasant resource to-day. No doubt some of them look back with sentimental gratitude to the little music teacher in the old home town who used to come to the house once a week to try and pound the rudiments into them. In the cities the widespread introduction of the Conservatory system has led to the disappearance of the visiting music-teacher; but perhaps she still survives in the smaller places. At any rate, I hope she does. In the old days she led a trying life in her endeavors to make musical ideas shoot in her boy pupils, but the seeds she sowed did not entirely fall on barren soil. So far as the cities are concerned a peculiar characteristic of musical instruction at the present time is the great preponderance of boys of foreign parentage among the sum total of those who take music lessons. This is not so true of the girls; the big conservatories have countless girl pupils of English-speaking origin, but so far as the boy musicians are concerned, nearly everyone that one hears much about wears a foreign name. Within the past fifteen years there has been a great increase in the number of violin students in Toronto,—a splendid sign, for the violin calls for real musical intuitions and intellectual grasp of essentials,—but it is rather obviously a foreign movement in which I hope to see our boys of British blood ultimately join.

boys think about their future enough to cultivate the arts that make life worth living, but perhaps if the youth is at all thoughtful it can be done. The best method, I should say, both in general instruction in schools and in the individual instruction of private pupils, to interest boys in music is to make music interesting. Not only must the aspect of drudgery be avoided but it is also clear that music cannot be made interesting by setting up a too severe standard of taste. Some consideration must be had for what appeals to the adolescent temperament. There is not the slightest doubt that certain recent types of music on which the purists frown, have a natural and inherent appeal to the youthful nature, and are in a measure an expression of the ebullience of growth. That is peculiarly true of what is known as "Jazz." You may preach against "Jazz" and write editorials deploring "Jazz" and forbid the hated thing the shelter of your roof,—but,—you cannot help young people liking "Jazz" and taking a sort of dizzy exaltation out of it. The solution seems to be to winnow out the "Jazz" and give countenance to those manifestations of it which show symptoms of real musical quality. If the boys are to be interested in music it must be through lively channels that express their natural vitality.

How much even a little musical accomplishment means to young men was effectively demonstrated during the war. The boys in a regiment, who were definitely sure of popularity were those who could play some instrument or other, or sing a song. It was found that a good many had the gift of playing the piano by ear; but the lad who could really play unfamiliar compositions and could vary the usual fare by something "High-class" once in a while, was honored. Nor did the soldiers always insist on something lively. I have heard of one young Canadian officer who was awarded the V.C. posthumously for superb bravery during the great advance of the summer of 1918; and who had a most remarkable gift for playing on that haunting instrument the ukelele. He had, (it was afterwards known) a real conviction that he was never to see Canada again, and the soft melancholy strains he used to evoke from his instrument were an expression of his premonition. He undoubtedly gave solace to himself and much pleasure to his comrades by his music, sad though it was. In the trenches there was no scoffing at music as a girl's accomplishment; it was regarded as a precious asset; and so the growing boys whose ideas of the war are vague must be taught to regard it.

Undoubtedly music will ultimately benefit from the systems which are being promulgated on this continent, whereby children of both sexes are caught young and instructed in good music as a means of play. I have seen classes of little boys from four to seven years old, who had been taught to feel the fascination, even of some of the simpler works of the abstruse Bach. No doubt many if not all of these youngsters, as they grow older and develop the stronger boy-characteristics will take a more tolerant view of music. To return to what I have said already, the answer to the question, how shall we interest boys in music is to try our best to make music more interesting to them, and less of a drudgery than it used to be.

A great deal could be accomplished if parents could succeed in getting the idea through the heads of the growing lads that musical knowledge and musical accomplishment, however slight, is a valuable asset to live by, not so much in a financial sense, as in a social sense; as a resource and recreation in advancing years. It is a difficult matter to make WHATEVER may be the present attitude of the boys toward music, this year's Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto has exemplified an enormous growth of musical interest and enthusiasm in the general public. Since this institution is attended of her finishing her appraising trip within the day.

Incontinently, she set to work and kindled a fire in the stove long before she had any need of it. She really could not put off till its conventional hour the pleasure of lighting this fire, her first in her own home. The simple act was to her symbolical of very much more than she could put into words. The first leaping of the cheery flame, followed by its steadier glow, filled her with a sort of mysterious awe, an unguessed heritage through the ages from savage ancestry when the kindling of a hearth fire was a significant act in the ritual of possession and dominion. "Her" fire,—that is what exalted it out of the commonplace. Moreover, a fire is the best of company. Under its hearty crackling, the little house was as if filled with guests.

"Now, I'll have a good look around at the outsides," declared Malvina, nodding a temporary farewell to the cheeriness within.

SHE found that the kitchen garden had October written ruthlessly all over it. The one or two remaining tomatoes were dark and mushy from a recent frost; the corn rustled in yellow spoliation; the potato hills were merely hollows and empty at that; the bean poles supported but leafless strings of stem from which the podded wealth had long been stripped; nothing remained but a few tough squash and a head or two of rabbit-nibbled cabbage; but Malvina saw it with the eye of optimistic futurity, green in the sprouting rows of spring, next spring, when she herself would plant it according to her own desires, not with Joey's cast-iron precision. It was the goodliest patch of garden she had ever seen.

She pulled a leathery leaf from the seeded lettuce and chewed it with meditative gusto.

"What kind, I wonder?" she ruminated. "It's the best I ever eat." She was tasting more than lettuce; it was the improving savor of ownership which gave to every mouthful its unique superiority,—ownership not valued because it meant personal aggrandizement but because it permitted the unfettering of a soul. On Joey's farm even so infinitesimal a trifle as a bite at a leaf of lettuce might not always chance to pass without belittling comment,—was she taking to rabbit feed for a change? perhaps she liked dirt, he preferred lettuce washed!—had he slackened up any on provisioning lately? if so, he'd go to town and tend to it. Joey's fleers generally masqueraded as jokes, but each held its intentioned sting. Malvina mildly made up her mind that the jokes prevailing on her own two acres should be of her own manufacture, or approximating that brand.

From the comfortable environment of her barren inheritance, she gazed with unenvious curiosity at the wooded estates of her neighbors, whose angle of roof or curl of smoke showed sociably above the branching of distant orchards.

"I b'lieve I'll run over to one and see if I can't buy a pint of milk," she murmured, advancing perfidious reason, for she preferred her tea clear.

Possessing herself of the gayest of all the seemly little jugs in the glass-doored dresser she ambled her contented way through fields and lanes till she reached the farmhouse of her selection.

The protests of a barking dog had heralded her approach, and a woman was in readiness upon the back porch to greet Malvina before she had need to knock. The woman eyed her with stern caution, not unkindly, but with the shrewd appraisement of country-folk.

"What do you want?" she asked with unadorned directness. She examined the milk pitcher, aloofly critical, and without admitting that it carried any suggestion

Striving to conceal her pride in being a neighbor and a landowner, Malvina joyously sketched her milkless condition and wound up with,

"So I jus' run over to ask if you had any,—to sell."

"Well, I d'know," said the woman doubtfully. "I'll see."

It seems to be a point of etiquette with a farmwife never to express any certainty of knowledge concerning her possession of a drop of milk, a shred of butter or a single egg. She always has to "see." But before disappearing for the purpose this woman unhesitatingly appropriated Malvina's pitcher and soon returned with it filled.

"Oh, thank you very much," said Malvina, pleasantly, hastening to brush away the steely disapprobation gathering on the other's face by hurriedly adding, "and what's the price of it?"

"Well, I d'know," said the woman, again firmly intrenching herself behind doubt, though the quoted price of milk per quart as given by the weekly paper from town all but leaped from her eye in order to attack Malvina should the latter tender a cent short.

"Five cents?" offered Malvina, risking nothing, for she knew.

"Well, all right," was the woman's acceptance, still intoned doubtfully.

Malvina began to back away. The strange woman was one quivering question mark from head to foot, but she kept her lips sealed. She, too, much wanted to know. It is only your woman who really does not care who makes the most persistent questioner. Malvina comprehendingly helped out a little more.

"Any time you're short of something, come and see if I mebbe haven't it, over yonder to Malvina Leed's! Good evenin'."

She turned and retraced her way. "To Malvina Leed's!" How the music of the expression sang in her ears and in her happy heart! Everything had been "Joey Leed's" for so carpingly long that she had grown to connect the title only with things annoying and unrestful. The content of her surroundings grew with each atom of experience. Besides a farm, she now had a neighbor and a good one. For Malvina was not deterred by that neighbor's exterior from detecting the warm womanliness within. This cold bargainer, cautious about squandering her friendship, her dignity, her reserve, her provisions, was just of the sterling strength to be of help in time of need. The frank and open eye above a chary tongue,—that tells a reassuring tale.

"Who babbles her sympathy, dribbles it," philosophized Malvina. "She's all right. If I was took sick to-night, she'd be over in the shake of a calf's tail—with somethin' hot."

She almost wished to be taken sick,—for the joy of the companionship. Joey had been a discourager of neighborliness. "Don't want nobody's old hens cackling 'round my roost," was his defense, persistently jocose, but unfailingly selfish. Malvina dashed away this reminiscence with a happy jerk of her head; this was not Joey Leed's, but Malvina's.

She had regained her own doorstep. The brief October day, vanishing without a warning twilight, had given place to cool crisp evening which would soon be night.

Either driven from its hiding place by cold or hunger, or wooed out by the security of darkness and an uncanny awareness of milk, a thin but amiable kitten arched and purred on the doorstep.

"The trollop!" said Malvina, scourgily, referring not to the kitten but to the erstwhile unmessy bride. "Too sweet-hearted to give you a merciful drowning, kitty, but able to leave you to freeze and starve! I know the kind! There's a-plenty of them. And they're all city-folk and ought to know better. Come in."

Frenziedly appreciative of the invitation, the kitten made a contorted entrance, squeezing into slim retreats, making immediate reappearance, arching with nervous suddenness, treading on hot eggs and purring royally.

"I kind of like a kitten," mused Malvina, pensively pouring it out some milk. "Ma most generally let us keep one, though she talked a heap."

Joey never talked. He acted. He said he wanted animals kept in their "right place." From evidence, this place was wherever it was unseen of Joey.

After rebuilding the fire and setting the kettle to boil, Malvina indulged in a long-suppressed instinct for illumination, trimming three lamps and letting one burn at its brightest in every room, so that the tiny domicile fairly shone with light.

This audacity incited her to a greater. "Sheets!" she announced with triumph, and dressed the bed accordingly. Joey was hygienic to violence in his denunciation of sheets, insisting the year round upon blankets.

"No eating in the kitchen!" she continued firmly, setting her tea table in the sitting room. "Not even a sight of the kitchen!" and she drew the turkey-red portiere across the door.

"Thin toast!" was her next order which she proceeded to execute with a deliberate unconcern of time which was in itself a rare happiness. In the house of Joey things were generally kept jumping by the clock.

Her happiness augmented when she heard the distant shriek of the approaching passenger train,—the one which she might have taken but did not, preferring to arrive at a new destination by daylight,—what hours of enjoyment she had gained by deciding not to come on it!

Before sitting down to her pretty tea-table, she went into the bedroom and "did over" her hair in front of the mirror framed in pine cones, and she noted with joy that traces of past comeliness had crept back to her face by reason of relaxation and content.

"This little home is goin' to be my soul's sanitarium!" she vowed aloud. The startled kitten gave a big purr. Lifting the flattered animal to her cheek, Malvina passed back into the kitchen and sat a blissful moment to enjoy the tranquillity of her surroundings, the grateful glow of the quiet fire, the inviting brightness of the rooms, the serene and confiding snuggle of the cat against her neck, the uninvaded solace of a silence which was not loneliness, of solitude which was not sorrow.

A sudden stumbling upon her door-stone, a man's muttered imprecation at his own misstep, did not arouse a particle of fear within her; she was too proudly anxious to play the hostess if only to a mistaken wayfarer. She hospitably stood, even before he should knock.

But no knock came. The knob was boisterously turned and the door banged open for the volcanically jocose entrance of Joey.

"Ah ha! nothing like coming unbeknownst to find what's going on!" he chuckled, uproariously, slamming the door behind him and lunging into the room. The tiny house shivered like a structure of cards, for Joey was over six feet high and broad accordingly, with long swinging limbs ending in sledge-hammer hands and anvil-like feet.

In a stupor of surprise, Malvina looked at him, blankly silent. She put down the kitten, quite unconscious that she had given it the kitchen table for a base, quite unheeding that it consolingly curled itself up where she laid it. The silence, brief though it was, pierced Joey's malevolent sensitiveness and pricked him to splenetic outburst,—

"Why, if you're not glad to see me I can go back the way I came, only walking stead of traveling!" and he crashed toward the door.

"No, don't!" cried Malvina, putting out a detaining hand. He was quite capable of carrying out his threat. His endurance was phenomenal,—when he could distress someone thereby. And she had been inhospitable. "It was good of you to come. I was surprised; that's all. It was real good of you, Joey."

Still glowering, he allowed himself to relent, sullenly relinquishing his hold of the doorknob. Then he divested himself of his coat and cap, hanging them upon the upper corner of the cupboard. Nothing was too high to serve him for a peg.

HE looked taller than ever in this confined dwelling. His immensity carried with it not the idea of strength, which is restful, but of force. His very coloring was aggressive. His hair was vividly red, glistening as if wet, and it virulently curled,—not loosely and softly, a lure for loving hands,—but curled with the vicious uniformity of copper springs. His eyes went inexorably with the hair, being brown as chestnuts but flecked with fiery red spots which gleamed maliciously whether in good humor or ill. His face was smooth except for the chin where there sprouted a suspicion of beard as crinkled, as red, as glistening as his hair. For the rest, he was a galvanic whirl of arms and legs.

"Not only did I think enough of you to come, but I brought you some supper," he grumbled. Snatching a parcel from his pocket and shaking from it a thick slice of ham, he thwacked a frying pan upon the stove, slammed the slice into it, and put all over the open fire where it was soon smoking and fuming and scorching and noisily spluttering.

"Now for a squirt through this dog kennel," he grinned, becoming amiable at the smell of the ham. He plunged into the sitting room, caught his shoulder in the portiere and without hesitation tore it from the pole and hurled it into a corner.

"Blamed poor taste putting hanging-truck in such a shantytan, wasn't it?" he asked, in a cordial tone which made sure of Malvina's cooperative approval.

She failed to answer him, being too nervously busy watching where the mud was spattering to, brought in on his heavy soles. She watched it with a weariness of heart out of proportion to the harm done, for she knew that October roads were prone to muddiness and that soiled boots could not help but leave a track, but tonight she seemed to see it all in a new light,—Joey was wilfully unchoicer of where he stepped, and how, and the mud in which he knowingly trod was significant of other avoidable things in life through which he drove ruthlessly, leaving dark stains over the lives of others.

Done with the sitting room, he promptly blew out the light and brought the tea tray in with him.

"No use wasting oil, is there, Mallie?" he demanded, still sure of having done the commendable. He set the tray upon the kitchen table, saw the cat, and without comment or question put it outside.

"Is this cubby-hole the bedroom?" he demanded, looking in with such scowling scorn that Malvina shrunk guiltily, almost as if her former approval of it had made her responsible for its meanness and his dissatisfaction in it.

His scorn changed to noisy laughter. "Of all the ratty quarters!" His laughter spent, he deigned to make the concession. "But I guess it's big enough to sleep in, just for to-night." As he spoke, he hauled the sheets from the bed, bunched them in a lump and tossed them to the floor, leaving the blankets in huddled disarray. Then he blew out that light. His overbearing demolition seemed to result less from an indifffor his wife's enjoyment and his children's pleasure.

Tested Seeds

Henry Hawkins wanted to have a lawn in front of his house;

He wanted grass seed that would grow quickly, look thick and green to the eye, not be easily worn out by the quick feet of tennis players, would repay cultivation and be of lasting use and pleasure.

Henry was none of your haphazard growers, so he took pains to learn something about the correct seed. He read up about it. He investigated the success and failure of his neighbors. He got Government information about tested seeds and chose what he considered a first-class buy.

Then he got a surprise!

All authorities said: "It isn't enough to buy tested seeds. Let an expert analyze your soil first, to see which of the good seeds are best suited to it."

Henry did so with surprisingly satisfactory results. The expert proved to be his best friend.

Henry was 28. He talked over the matter with the London Life agent, who after mature consideration of Henry's case, advised a sixteen-payment, twenty-year endowment policy for $5,000.

There were 16 premiums of $255.—$4,080 in all.

If Henry died at any time within the twenty years, the full $5,000 would be paid to his wife and children, in a single sum or by instalments, whichever he chose, together with the profits on the policy at the date of his death.

If Henry lived he could, at the end of twenty years, take the $5,000 in a lump sum (with profits added) or have it paid to him in instalments. He might purchase with the full sum, a paid-up life insurance policy for $10,000 or an annuity for himself that would bring him $27.18 a month for the remainder of his life.

If he had wanted a loan he could, after having paid three premiums, have used this policy as security, and borrowed on it.

The agent explained the policy so Henry could not fail to understand what he was getting.

Henry Hawkins wanted to insure his life; for his wife's benefit, and his children's protection.

He wanted insurance that would not cost too much or be too long and continuous a tax upon his pocket; that would give immediate safety and a lasting income; and that in case of his death, would be administered as a sacred trust.

Henry was none of your haphazard investors. He read up about life insurance and investigated the policies held by his neighbors. He got Government ratings of Canadian and foreign companies and chose what seemed to him a first class buy.

Then he got a surprise!

The authorities said: "It isn't enough to buy gilt-edged policies. Let an expert analyse your need first to see which of the good plans is best suited to your circumstances."

Henry did so with surprisingly satisfactory results. The expert proved to be his best friend.

INFANTILE PARALYSIS

(Anterior Polio-Myelitis).

It is a matter for great thankfulness that very few cases of this disease have been reported in Canada during the past fortnight. Our Medical Officers of Health in the cities where the first cases appeared did not think it likely that we were threatened with an epidemic and fortunately they were right, as they generally are.

THE USUAL INCREASE IN LATE SUMMER-TIME

Usually there is a slight increase in the number of cases of infantile paralysis reported during August and September over the number reported in May, June and July.

INCREASE IN 1921

There was a decided increase in the number reported in New York and other American cities during August and September 1921, but no increase was then noticed in Canada.

In New York, one of the most favourable signs observed was that the cases were not "grouped." That is, the reports did not show that a large number of the cases reported were in one block, or one district or one street. Such a "grouping" would have indicated comparatively rapid infection from one child to another.

BE CAREFUL BUT NOT OVER-ANXIOUS

Anxious parents should be first of all advised not to be over-anxious. It is not at all likely your children will have this disease.

Don't worry. That makes everything worse. Do not let the children over-exert themselves, especially in hot weather. They are better to play quietly with their brothers and sisters and in their own yard, or in a park. Do not let them play with other children. This is important.

If at all possible, have them lie down for an hour or two every afternoon. Never mind if they do not sleep; the rest in a darkened room is almost as good.

THE UNRECOGNIZED CASES

It is the mild and unrecognized case or "carrier" who is the chief danger in carrying infection. A child may have the causative germ in the throat and nose and may remain quite well or very slightly indisposed. This child remains almost or quite well, because he has good "immunity," or natural protection against this germ. Fortunately most children have this good protection, even at an early age. But if some poor child who has little or no natural protection (immunity) against the disease, plays with the "mild case" or "carrier" or kisses him or handles a pencil he has had in his mouth, such a child is in great danger of suffering from infantile paralysis. So do not let your children play on the street. Keep them at home and let them play by themselves. And wash their hands and faces sometimes; always do so before meals.

WE HAVE LEARNED SOMETHING

One of the most important things we have learned during the past year or two about so-called infantile paralysis is that often those who suffer an attack do not have paralysis at all. The illness is short and light and leaves no bad effects. In other words, the cases are not recognized. This has been confirmed by "The Harvard Medical Commission," according to an article published in the "Journal of the American Medical Association," June 24, 1922:—

"The Harvard Medical Commission is making a five-year study into the causes and treatment of infantile paralysis, and recently made a report of progress. The Commission has about 2,000 actual cases under its supervision, while it is at the present time treating more than 1,000. The fundamental fact established is that infantile paralysis is not always or necessarily accompanied by paralysis; practically 50 per cent of the cases are not paralytic. It is estimated that there are 100,000 sufferers from the crippling effects of this disease in the United States today. The Harvard experts believe that they have found a method of after-treatment of the disease, based on "muscle training," though, even under the most favorable conditions, progress is likely to be slow."

Other authorities think that more than half of the cases do not suffer from paralysis.

WHAT SHALL WE DO

At all times, any acute illness in children, however slight, should receive the immediate attention of the family doctor, or if this is not possible, the child should be taken to the nearest hospital. Then the child will get every care and every case will be properly reported—a great protection to all. Headache, nausea, vomiting, fever, pains in back and legs—wanting to be held all the time in someone's arms, not wanting to move—these are danger signals.

Cleanliness is a safeguard. Do not let the child's nose get dirty, neglected or sore. It always makes a careful, sensible person uneasy to see a child with a sore, dirty, uncared-for nose.

It has been shown by Dr. Simon Flexner and other eminent authorities that the causative germ not only is contained in the naso-pharyngeal secretions of patients with the disease, but it enters the body of the patient by the same route—namely, the throat and nose. These are the gates of infection. That is where the enemy makes entrance. Never neglect a sore throat.

REPORTED CURES BY SERUM TREATMENT

It is reported that a serum, the mode of preparation of which is similar to the mode of preparation of anti-diphtheritic serum, has been successfully used in the treatment and cure of Anterior Polio-Myelitis in several places in the United States. A Sanitary Bulletin published in an American city on July 31, 1922, contains a reference to this, saying that the serum prepared by Dr. Edward C. Rosenow, of the Mayo Foundation, Rochester, Minnesota, has been successful.

by nearly all the men responsible for the direction of other great fairs in various parts of Canada and the United States, it is likely that the special attention given to music will prove an influence that will be broadcasted to many points of the compass, and is not merely of local or provincial significance. The Canadian Bureau for the Advancement of Music which started the "Music in the Home" movement a few years ago is largely responsible for the ever increasing enthusiasm which is being exemplified everywhere. At Toronto so many men working assiduously and patiently throughout the summer months in the cause of music were bound to achieve much. But they could not have made the musical outburst so splendid if they had not a prepared public sentiment to work upon.

Music Day, which was fixed for August 30th. was probably the most complete and varied exploitation of music from the popular standpoint that has ever been seen on this continent. On all parts of the vast grounds concerts of various kinds were constantly in progress, and roving groups of troubadours in costume sang in the open air. Perhaps the biggest hit was made by a small Ukrainian choir which sang the folk songs of Little Russia, and the cosmopolitan nature of the day was also emphasized by beautiful renderings of plantation songs, and more pretentious music by a negro choral society. Other factors which tended to give a musical stamp to the whole exhibition were a great multiplicity of band concerts and band contests. One professional band came from a city as far distant as Kingston, Jamaica but it did not compare with the Anglo-Canadian Band of Huntsville, Ontario, which despite the fact that it has its home in a partially wooded wilderness is a great institution. Grand opera on a high artistic scale at incredibly low prices was another feature of the later days of the fair which marks the beginning of a new era.

The effect of this sudden rise of music to an almost predominant place in the functions of the Canadian National Exhibition has been to give that historic institution a gala character that it never before possessed, and to attract to its gates daily throngs of people who in recent years have been satisfied with a single visit or have stayed away altogether. A feature which will undoubtedly be adopted by other fairs, especially in Western Canada, and which because of its unique character focussed attention, was the Pageant Chorus. It marked the introduction to this country of the monster choruses which for many years past have been a feature of musical life in the north of England. From the standpoint of high musical expression, I do not myself favor monster choruses. The best choral results are to be obtained from organizations ranging from 150 to 230 voices; but for gala occasions an aggregation like the Pageant Chorus which contained upwards of 1800 singers of more or less experience is certainly impressive. The experiment was one that Dr. H. A. Fricker, the conductor of the Mendelssohn Choir, who won his spurs at Leeds, Yorkshire, in the region which is the home of vast choruses, has been anxious to try ever since he came to Canada in 1916. His handling of his forces certainly justified his ambition, for it was literally amazing that so large a body of singers could be drilled into enunciating each syllable as though one individual voice were singing. The mass tonal effect in the open air was immense and in the closed buildings in which rehearsals were held almost too overpowering in volume. The success of the experiment with the public proved conclusively that the vast chorus for special occasions has come to us to stay, and in future it should be possible for other cities to organize similar singing bodies, if not of equal dimensions at least approximate thereto.

Is vacuum cleaning really hard on rugs?

Although electric vacuum cleaners are now used in millions of homes, and are regarded as indispensable by their owners, occasionally the question arises whether this method of cleaning is injurious to rugs.

Statements that it is, sometimes have gained wide circulation. Traced down, however, these statements have proved to be groundless. Prejudice, misunderstanding, imagination—and in certain instances, pure maliciousness—have been their inspiration.

Unfortunately, many people have been influenced by these rumors. As a consequence they have been deprived of time, labor, economic and other benefits that would otherwise have been theirs long ago.

What Users Say

"Because of its satisfactory service, and the fact that our rugs wear from 3 to 5 years longer than formerly, I say without the slightest hesitation that The Hoover produces the best results in cleaning and is more economical (from viewpoint of rug and cleaner) than any machine which I have ever seen demonstrated." MRS. ELIZ. C. GRIDER, House Director, Cornell Univ., Ithaca, N. Y.

"My Hoover has been in continuous use for 11 years and is still doing good work. The excellent condition of my Oriental Rugs is due largely to the efficient cleaning principles of The Hoover." MRS. JAMES McMURRAY, Marion, Ohio

What Carpet Makers Say

"In our opinion, the (Beating-Sweeping) brush—a feature of the Hoover Sweeper—is not injurious to rugs. We consider a brush a very important feature of a Suction Sweeper, and we fail to see how any valid objection can be raised against the (Beating-Sweeping) brush used in The Hoover." BIGELOW-HARTFORD CARPET CO., New York City.

"The Hoover Suction Sweeper purchased from you about 10 years ago has been used ever since and given excellent service. We always recommend The Hoover to inquiring customers." HARDWICK & MAGEE COMPANY, Philadelphia, Pa.

What Oriental Rug Experts Say

"We know The Hoover to be efficient, durable and effective without injuring the fabric. It gives new life to floor coverings. We are glad to say a word of praise for The Hoover, and recommend it to all those desiring to purchase a cleaning machine." AMERICAN RUG & CARPET CO., Chicago, Ill.

"After a thorough investigation, we do not hesitate to endorse and recommend The Hoover for cleaning Oriental Rugs. The Hoover does not injure the peculiar construction of the Oriental fabric. In fact, it prolongs the life." A. ALEON'S SON (Oriental Rug Importer), New York City.

Possibilities of a Good White Sauce

BY FRANCES M. McNALLY

SOMEONE once said that a cook may be judged by the kind of white sauce she makes. There is more truth in this statement than would at first appear, for the woman who can make good white sauce has a foundation for a variety of luncheon and supper dishes, limited only by her own ingenuity and skill in combining.

A good white sauce must have certain qualities. It must be perfectly smooth, thoroughly cooked, of exactly the right consistency and properly flavored. The smoothness may be secured by adding the liquid slowly to the blended flour and fat and stirring constantly until the liquid thickens. To assure a thoroughly cooked sauce, allow the mixture to cook for several minutes after it has thickened. A delicate flavoring is secured by cooking a few chopped vegetables carefully in the fat and removing them before the flour is added. Different consistencies are desirable for different types of dishes, as will be noticed by the following recipes. The recipes differ only in the proportions of the ingredients; the method in each case is the same.

White Sauce No. 1, for toast, and the basis of cream soups: One tablespoon butter, one tablespoon flour, one cup milk, one-quarter teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon pepper.

White Sauce No. 2, for creamed meats, fish or vegetables: Two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour; one quarter teaspoon salt, one-eighth teaspoon pepper, one cup milk.

White Sauce No. 3, for escalloped dishes and for soufflés: Three tablespoons butter, three tablespoons flour, seasoning, one cup milk.

White Sauce No. 4 for Croquettes: Four tablespoons butter, four tablespoons flour, one cup milk, seasonings.

The method in each case is as follows: Melt the butter, gradually stir in the flour and seasonings until the mixture becomes frothy. Add the milk very gradually, stirring constantly until the mixture thickens. Cook for several minutes after mixture is the desired consistency. Scalding the milk before adding it is an advantage. Potato flour gives excellent results with much less cooking than wheat flour.

There are many ways in which a white sauce may be varied. One half cup of celery, asparagus, cauliflower, or green peas, added to one cup of White Sauce No. 2, makes an excellent sauce to serve with chicken, meat or fish croquettes, and is a good way to use up left over vegetables. By adding one cup of chopped mushrooms to white sauce No. 1 you convert it into mushroom sauce.

For Egg Sauce, place two eggs in rapidly boiling water, cover lightly, remove to cooler part of stove and let stand for six minutes. The whites should be solid and yolks soft. Beat in the soft yolks and add the chopped whites to White Sauce No. 2. Just before serving add one teaspoon chopped parsley. Serve with boiled fish.

To make a Cheese Sauce, simply add one-half cup of grated cheese to white sauce No. 2 and for Tomato Sauce, substitute strained tomato juice for the milk.

Brown Sauce may be made by substituting brown stock for the milk and adding a few drops of kitchen bouquet. Drain, rinse and dry eight medium sized olives and add them to the brown sauce, and you have Olive Sauce.

Cream soups are simply combinations of vegetable pulp with White Sauce No. 1, as the following recipes show.

Cream of Vegetable Soup: Take one creamed onion, a few peas, carrots, string beans, or any green vegetables left from dinner, and while still slightly warm press them through a sieve. Keep

How to Make Money at Home in Spare Time!

*Every Wife or Self-Supporting Girl Can Use Extra Money for Clothes.
Why Not Make it Yourself—Right at Home, This New Way?*

IS THE more-money problem worrying you. Does it seem as if the rent comes due oftener, that the children's clothes wear out quicker, the family bills pile up higher than before?

Does it seem as if the dollars simply will not stretch to meet the bills and still get the things you need and want?

Think what it would mean, then, to be able to earn at home the extra amounts you need for the little luxuries you desire. Think of having always at hand a means of turning your spare hours into money!

If you are ambitious, if you want more money, if you have some spare time each week, plus the will-to-work and a degree of adaptability, you CAN turn your spare hours into dollars by knitting Old Tyme All-Wool Socks at home on the Auto Knitter.

Mrs. John Fitzgerald, a Newfoundland woman whose husband was working only half-time, took up Auto-Knitting in order to increase the family income. By managing her time systematically, she is able to make substantial amounts without interfering with her household duties. When she sells her output locally, to stores and neighbors, she often makes $35.00 a week clear profit. Mrs. Fitzgerald says:

"I have made with my machine the net sum of $500.00. This money has supplied me with the necessary wants for two years and I have been able to put some aside for a rainy day. I have also purchased a beautiful kitchen range, some pieces of furniture, a lovely sleigh for my horse, a clothes-wringer and many other useful things, besides clothes for my children. All these things I would never have attained if I had not purchased my machine some two years ago."

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Percy W. Taylor, of Alberta, has been made much more prosperous and happy by the use of an Auto-Knitter. They have a large family and the problem of making ends meet became all-engrossing. Then an Auto-Knitter advertisement showed the way to make money at home, and now the Taylors have this to say of their success:

"Within fifteen months after getting our Auto-Knitter, and after having provided food, clothing and other incidentals for a large family, we were able to pay $600 cash for a piano. The oldest child now takes music lessons. The regular income that the Auto-Knitter brings in pays the bills and brings a confidence and encouragement that knows no doubt, as it has been our mainstay and comfort in times of adversity."

When Mrs. A. A. Clark and her husband, of Alberta, hopefully rented a farm they expected to make good money, but what with drouth and poor prices their plans failed and they were forced to find some way of making extra money. Then it was that the Auto-Knitter came to help. Mrs. Clark now writes:

"We had planned to send the whole output to the company, but when we saw what a good article the machine could produce and how readily they sold, we decided to build up a good local trade. In all we have made over $200. this last winter."

These are but a few of the many people who are turning spare hours into cash with the Auto-Knitter. Many workers whom we prefer to class as exceptional report much larger earnings than those we mention. The earnings vary with the amount of time devoted to the work and the speed of the individual operator, but whether the amount be large or small, it is most welcome, and helps to make the lives of these workers easier and happier.

Guaranteed Price for Standard Products

You are given a signed Five year Contract, guaranteeing you a market for every pair of standard Olde Tyme Socks you produce, and fixing a definite price which you will be paid for your work, in addition to which you will be furnished with yarn to replace, pound for pound, that which you send us in the form of socks.

You can work as much as you please or as little as you please—and the standard product you complete can be disposed of promptly and profitably to the company. You are not compelled or obligated in any way to send any part or all of your work to the company unless you wish. You can make socks and sell them to your friends, neighbors and local trade. But if you prefer not to canvass or do any selling, then it is always your privilege to send your standard socks to us and receive our fixed rate of payment, together with replacement yarn.

More Than $18,000 a Year Being Paid to Workers

To workers who are taking advantage of the Work Contract, we are now paying earnings at the rate of more than $18,000.00 per year. In addition to this, we are shipping workers more than $232,000 worth of fine Olde Tyme Wool Yarn.

From these workers, we are receiving Olde Tyme Wool Socks at the rate of more than 150,000 pairs per year. This does not include the large number made by workers and sold to their own trade. This immense number of pairs are received at the factory, where they are sorted and shipped to more than 1,000 dealers in all parts of the country, including department stores, men's furnisiers and general stores.

Yet out of this large number of socks received from novices as well as experts, from new workers as well as old, less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned as being below the standard set for Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks.

Positive Proof of Success

The large volume of socks received shows that Auto-Knitting is not an exclusive accomplishment, confined to the abilities of the few, but a profitable home occupation that can be successfully entered by the average individual.

Odds and Ends

The life of a Samoan woman is pleasant. She is neither overworked nor savagely treated. From her earliest childhood she is trained in the intricacies of the siva-siva, and all her life the dance is a source of pleasure to her. Samoan women will always dance for you if you ask them, and they show by their smiles and songs how much they delight in granting the request. In their girlhood they deck themselves with flowers and garlands of leaves and are fond of coquetry but, unlike their Polynesian sisters of the Marquesas and Society Islands, they are chaste, says Edward A. Salisbury in "Asia."

Before the coming of the Americans with new medical theories, the life of an infant was doubtful, and even now the old customs are carried out in some villages, it is said. The new-born child was laid on its back, and three flat stones were placed around the head. To make the baby beautiful, the family thought it necessary to flatten the forehead and nose. Nothing is uglier, they feel, than our hideous, pointed "canoe-noses." The baby was fed with filtered coconut-juice for three days, while a "wise-woman" tested the mother's milk. Often the child died. The birth of a child is the occasion for a feast. The father's man friends bring presents which they give to the mother's woman friends, and vice versa.

Children are carefully trained. The mother takes charge of the daughters, and the father, of the sons. The Americans have established schools, and many of the younger generation now speak English. Both girls and boys are anxious to be recognized as women and men. A girl becomes a woman at marriage; a boy, when tattooed. This custom is usually observed when the lad is sixteen. It is a severe operation. The boy does not face it alone. He gathers a half dozen friends of like age, and all go together to the tattooer who, like the house-builder, is a member of a very select profession. The tattooer takes his needle made of human bone, dips it into a composition of candlenut, ashes and water, puts it against the skin and raps the point in with blows from a mallet. When the boy can no longer stand the pain, another takes his place. The process requires about two months. At the end of that time, the boy is tattooed from waist to knee.

A writer in "Jack o' London's Weekly" has written an amusing article on Franco-English exchange of words. This courtesy, though doubtlessly well meant, is often clumsy in effect. Says Mr. Roche, the present researcher, to give our French friends the floor, they have adopted many of our sporting terms quite unnecessarily, since their own words have exactly the same meaning as those they have paid us the compliment of borrowing from our vocabulary.

Paper-chase, crack, preliminary, canter, hammerless (in the case of a gun), cruising, round (of a pugilistic encounter), stand, race, to dope, brook, have one and all their French equivalents in rallye-papier, champion, galop, d'essai, sans chien, croisière, reprise, tribune, course, droguer, and ruisseau. They have coined an extraordinary French verb in pouloler, which, it is claimed, is the English for galloper, since it is said to be "derived," save the mark, from to pull up!

Un squarmouth will be a puzzle to many, although many Canadians think it very English indeed, for do we not go on our travels with a square-mouthed kitbag? It was necessary for the writer to see a picture of a squarmouth, in an advertisement, to enable him to grasp the meaning of the word. Un smoking (our dinner-jacket) has long ago had the freedom of the ville de Paris and other towns, but dancings is of a much later date.

Rowing, which has held its own for many a long year, has fallen into disrepute,

There Is a Difference in Sweepers

Note These Facts

Bissell's is more than four wheels, a brush and a box. Only Bissell's has the famous "Cyco" Ball Bearings—the principle that always brings the brush in correct contact with any kind of carpet or rug, making sweeping easier and more thorough. It is the cheapest sweeper—per year of service. Its average life is 10 to 15 years. So the cost is only a few dimes per year.

And it is made better and stronger throughout the handiest and most efficient sweeping tool made.

undoubtedly is an ever-increasing use of various masonry mediums, such as cement, brick, tile, stone and slate. Linoleum, too, applied over a foundation of either cement or wood, has of late won wide approval as a porch flooring. Canvas is also frequently used, as it unquestionably prolongs the life of the wooden floor beneath.

A polished hardwood floor is well adapted to any enclosed porch that is intimately connected with other rooms having the same type of flooring. It wears indefinitely, if properly protected from the elements; and it offers a smooth surface that is easy to clean. From the standpoint of decoration, however, an ordinary wooden floor artistically painted has much in its favor. One attractive scheme has been developed around a floor that is painted dark gray and bordered with a two-foot band composed of alternating six-inch squares of royal blue and silver gray. A Scotch wool rug of a rather dark gray forms an ideal floor-covering. The furniture is of wicker, painted royal blue and cushioned in a changeable orange-and-gray sun-resisting material. The changeable fabric is also used for the long, straight window-hangings; with glass-curtains of old gold gauze that cast a sunny glow over the walls and ceiling of rough, light gray plaster and the gray-enameled woodwork.

The cement floor shares with the wood in these colorful possibilities, notwithstanding its rather lifeless basic hue. Occasionally, the entire floor is colored—but, unfortunately, as a rule only a bright pinkish-red that is glaring and altogether irreconcilable. Preferably, when color is desired to enliven a cement floor, inlays of tile, brick or slate are depended upon. Of these, tile is particularly dependable, as it is available in an endless range of colorings, sizes and designs; although slate is almost equally useful, as it can be cut in any quantity or form required. Slate, indeed, used alone is admirable, whether laid in simple square or oblong blocks or in some interesting geometrical pattern.

Brick and tile—alone or in combination—are now very generally used; as much because of their availability as on account of their cleanliness and colour variation. One floor of dark red brick is lifted entirely out of the commonplace by the square motif executed in small blue and violet tiles which is inlaid at two-foot intervals. Both tile and brick are sometimes used to impart spots of color to a porch-floor of stone. Interesting as this combination is, it is not suitable for other than an enclosed porch of somewhat rugged character; for stone, as a sturdy, coarse-textured material, can only be successfully used indoors when all the furnishings

A delicate arrangement of white-painted lattice is disposed against the ivory-enameled plaster walls of this sunny breakfast-porch, where very simple furniture of dull brown mahogany is appropriately employed. The one large rug of Chinese workmanship has a soft rose-colored ground, with dull blues and yellows introduced in the characteristic design. The windows are devoid of tight-obscuring draperies. Quite as decorative as hangings, however, are the effective shades of a glazed English Chintz; its pattern gay with rose-hued blooms against a background of black-and-white stripes.

erence to the preferences of others than from an unassailable conviction of the universal superiority of his own.

"It's exactly as I thought, Mallie," he sagely announced. "The place is worthless, or it wouldn't 'a' been given to you." Here he flapped over the slice of ham and sent a grease shower hissing and snapping across the stove. "So I told Tod Beasley this morning that I'd trade it with him for his clover lot, down our way, and he, having folks hereabout, agreed. I told him the deeds and signing and such'd have to be seen to with you, but that you'd trade all right. What do you (me ownin' the finest farm in the state) want with a truck patch like this? I told him you couldn't pay the taxes on it and I wouldn't; and that settled it. Let's have supper."

Picking up the brown paper which had wrapped the ham, he planked it on the table for a mat, and dropped the reeking frying-pan upon it. Then he kicked off his boots, jerked off his coat, tore off his collar,—and was dressed for dinner.

He munched and crunched his meal to its resounding end, then elbowed the dishes out of the way, never doubting for a minute but that Malvina had finished because he had, lit his pipe and extended his wool-encased feet toward the warmth of the stove.

"Now, ain't this pretty comfortable?" he advanced persuasively. "Ain't this better than being alone, Mallie?"

She had been glancing furtively at the ruin about her, her heart acknowledging the same desolation as was miserably patent in her disordered dwelling.

Through the dusk of the rooms there still lingered the murk from the frying-pan. Huddled furniture, torn drapery, kicked rugs and muddled floors marked the havoc and wrack of Joey's ever unquiet passage. The banished kitten mewed persistently. Over and above all the material signs of destructiveness brooded the outraged spirit of Malvina's harmless individuality. The tragedy of the larger world—its dominion of aggressiveness—threatened to stamp itself in pale miniature upon her frightened face and silent lips, when through the blackest of storm clouds there burst the illuminating sun of rebellion.

"Ain't it, I say?" Joey jolted the table to obtain assent to his question; and then his jaw dropped almost in horror when he discovered that Malvina was not as usual quivering under his hectoring assault, and that her face was gathering the peacefulness known only to assertion.

"Joey," she said, explainingly. "The summer rent for my house was put into bank in my name, an'll pay for the taxes for some years to come, so I'm not a-going to sell yet awhile. No, nor trade, nor nothing, never!"

"What the—the—the dog!—are you goin' to do with the place?" he burst out.

Malvina rose to the awful height of levity.

"Play house," she answered, with a benign smile.

Joey's jaw dropped a hopeless inch lower, and under the encouragement of that sign Malvina arose with gentle firmness, opened the door and let in the kitten.

Exquisitely appointed and of rare beauty, the 1923 McLaughlin-Buick seven-passenger sedan possesses the many special qualities which women for years have looked for in a motor car.

The body, by Fisher, is low and easy to enter. The interior is luxurious with rich plush upholstery and trimming. Deep, yielding seat cushions and springs of a distinctive type afford a new degree of restful riding comfort on any road.

The smooth, quiet McLaughlin-Buick Valve-in-Head motor is, as ever, a masterpiece of reliability. The steering wheel is placed at the correct angle for easy steering and responds to the lightest pressure of the hand. The control levers are at fingers' end. Every device for the comfort and convenience of the driver is provided.

With these qualities, which make the 1923 McLaughlin-Buick sedan an ideal woman's car, go the dependability and performance which are inseparably linked with the name McLaughlin-Buick.

are proportionately heavy in effect. Nevertheless, when rightly placed, a stone floor can be both practical and attractive.

In using linoleum, whether over wood or cement, the material is cemented down and a layer of deadening felt or builders' paper is placed beneath it. This insures a floor that is not only warm and weather-proof, but pleasantly resilient. Parquet patterns vie with tessellated designs and unpatterned surfaces of gratifying color rival intricate tile devices in the linoleum floorings now so widely obtainable for the enclosed porch.

ALTHOUGH a rug may not be an actual essential, it is a furnishing that can add very materially to both the appearance and the comfort of an enclosed porch. Whether one large rug or several smaller rugs be used is, of course, a matter of personal preference. When more than one rug is used, however, there should be complete uniformity in coloring and design.

The oval, braided-rush rugs are effective; provided the other furnishings have the requisite virility of line and construction—and this is equally applicable to any woven or braided rugs in straw, jute or grass. For use with furniture of lighter character, whether in willow, wicker or painted wood, the rag rugs that are so deservedly to the fore at present offer a limitless choice in size and shape, as well as in coloring and weave. The Scotch wool reversible rugs are equally commendable, as they admirably withstand the wear and tear to which the average porch rug is subjected.

If an enclosed porch is to be set aside for any definite purpose or if it is to be used only occasionally, the choice of a floor-covering can be governed accordingly. This is instanced by the selection of a thick-piled Chinese rug in rose, blue and yellow for one small enclosed porch that is occupied solely during the informal meals of the day. Naturally, the wearing qualities can be almost the last consideration in choosing a rug for limited service of this sort. In another enclosed porch, very heavy velvet rugs in subdued taupe are employed—and appropriately; because this porch is virtually only an alcove of the adjoining living room, where the rugs correspond in material and color.

The furniture and the furnishings of an enclosed porch should, under ideal auspices, be suggestive alike of freedom of the garden and the conventionality of the house. The combination of various styles and materials is, then, not only permissible: it is desirable. Painted wooden furniture can congenially hobnob with wicker, while willow can familiarly rub elbows with mahogany. In one delightful porch, for example, two old mahogany tables and a quaint footstool have as neighbors a davenport and several roomy armchairs of wicker, gray enamel as to finish and chintz-cushioned in gray, old blue and ruddy brown. And—possibly to emphasize the studied informality of this porch!—to the combination has been added painted wrought iron; a tall floor-lamp, a narrow console and a flower-stand, all decorated in browns and blues enriched with dull gold.

For home-owners of more conservative taste, furniture of either wood, cane, wicker, reed or willow, stained or painted in quiet colorings, is always popular: and, when effectively colored, even very inexpensive furniture can be made attractive. Green, blue, gray, sand, brown, certain shades of mauve and many varieties of yellow and orange are suitable for porch furniture. Black is distinctive, and white is interesting, especially when relieved by some brilliancy of color in the cushions or other accessories. A scarlet-and-white striped linen for the white-painted furniture would surely be pleasantly stimulating: a black chintz, parrot-patterned in rose, tan, blue and green,

THIS is a glorious day in the first week of September—Labor Day, to be exact—but anything less suggestive of toil and trouble than the sunshine of to-day you cannot imagine. Of course, by the time you read this; the cold winds may be blowing and the brown and gold leaves may be whirling everywhere. To-day is summer in warmth, with a touch of autumn coloring and a hint of haziness which make it a perfect September memory. If one could only carry away the picture in ing tangerine; zinnias, calendula and marigolds accentuate the gold and make the garden seem as if floral fires were kindled there. An old-time hostelry with grey, ivy-draped walls, stands invitingly near; and, to the north stretches a woodland of varied beauty.

Who would be indoors on the fourth of September when sky and woods and wayside are inviting us to come out and enjoy the golden hours while they last? There is a wonderful old woods, with oaks, maple and birch making a brave one's heart of the fields flooded in the sunlight and the trees with branches waving softly to and fro! This is the country, be it understood;—the country de luxe, with electric light at your command and the best road in Ontario a stone's-throw away.

There are all the pungent odors of autumn already perfuming the breeze:—pine and cedar and nasturtium seem blended into health-giving fragrance. There are glorious blooms everywhere:—asters, from pale mauve to deep purple; nasturtiums, from light yellow to a flam-display:—and there are pines everywhere:—such splendid sentinels they look, standing guard through grey days and gold. But what has all this to do with the Vanity Box? You may well make such an inquiry, but you are quite mistaken if you think the sunshine and the flowers have nothing to do with the needs of the seeker of fairness and "good looks." Now the September sun is beguiling, for you think that it surely will not do to you even as it might have

The Longer Skirt Triumphs

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

HOW true it is that "self respect is often born in the tailor shop or the costumer's parlour," as someone has wisely said. We visit the tailor or the costumer, conscious of being clad in a mis-fitting or ill-chosen garment and feeling at cross-purposes with the world in general; we come out, feeling as if there were a different sun in the sky and as if somehow, the people we meet in the street had undergone a transformation, all because someone has known just how to hang a drape or choose a color. Surely the designers of women's garments who work these miracles are benefactors of their race. We never know just how much comfort we get body, and this is rather difficult to accomplish. A corset that will hold the figure flat across the back is very essential to the new silhouette, and only one of firm material and snug-fitting can be expected to do this. On the other hand, the tight hip-line gives the slender figure beautiful lines, and some of the most graceful street gowns are made of fine Poiré twill, navy blue of course, low waist-line with the back of the body blousing over it, the hips tight and the front drapery caught up at the side front with a large cabochon of some kind. We must not forget that the lower edge of the skirt dips and curves and does almost everything but follow a straight out of our clothes until we find ourselves in a distressing nightmare, enduring the humiliation of finding that we have started upon a journey with considerably less on us than convention demands and are trying to find our way back to cover without being seen. This is one of the occasions when we are not sorry to awake and find it only a dream. And all this is apropos of the "lure and wonder of clothes."

By this time, we suppose all the readers of the JOURNAL have accepted the fact of longer skirts? Of course we don't like them; at least we say we don't; condescendingly, we say we suppose we shall have to wear them. But, really, I think we shall like them when we get used to them. They may add years to the appearance of the figure, but they will also add grace, if worn gracefully and made to hang properly. That is the great difficulty with most of those we see on the street so far, and that is why we do not like them. The tight hip line has come into fashion simultaneously with the longer skirt, but it is not everyone who can wear it. The large woman must wear her clothes easy fitting and never skin tight, so the tight hip-line is not for her unless she can modify it with a bloused and even course. Navy blue is enlivened with facings and extensions of a beautiful shade of red like that of ripe mountain ash berries and stitched with a fine gold thread.

THE large woman need no longer feel constrained to apologize for her proportions for the designer of ready to wear garments has recognized her and is making models to suit her requirements; even the exclusive specialty shop that sells gowns by appointment, has taken note of her needs and is selecting the models that will be most apt to appeal to her.

The low waist line seems to have been specially devised for the large woman, but beware of the dress that has no drapery, even though it be gorgeously embroidered. It needs panels, pleatings or skilfully arranged drapery to make it look really modish.

Skirt drapery is an art in itself this season as you will see when the fall gowns are displayed in the shops. One wonders how the designers manage to get the folds that appear to come from somewhere under the hem and cross over to the opposite side and disappear under the girdle, or how they contrive to make a skirt out of three pieces of cloth without a seam. But they do and the effect is pleasing. Cascades and irregular hem lines go a long way towards making the fall models attractive.

Sleeves refuse to be confined to any set style. There are just about as many different styles as there are designers making them. Now and then one finds a dress without any sleeve at all; in fact our friends who are returning from Paris, tell us that even day time dresses are made sans sleeves, but they are not credulous enough to hint that any Canadian will face the rigors of this climate wearing a sleeveless frock—except for evening wear—even for the sake of being said to be in the fashion. Designers are very skilful at compromising with Fashion and we have seen some models with a deep berthe over the shoulders which veils the arm to the elbow and almost—not quite—conceals the fact that the frock has no sleeves. These are pretty for misses' afternoon frocks and are also used for evening wear. But one of the prettiest sleeves we have seen seems to have been made by draping an oblong piece of material over the shoulder, allowing as much of it to fall over the back as the front and stitching it over the shoulder to the bust in front and the same distance in the back. This leaves a straight line across the top of the bodice and the sleeves hang in points.

It used to be said that Russian blouse suits were a "winter style," and perhaps they are, for no Russian blouse looks well unless it is buttoned up tight around the throat and that of course is what we want during our crisp winter weather, or even the invigorating autumn days. At any rate, Russian blouse suits are one of Fashion's choicest offerings for the coming season. Let us describe one that is before us as we write. In the first place it is made of black velvet with grey caracul trimming. The shoulders are long with the sleeve joined on well below the curve of the shoulder; the waist line is low and the body blouses over it as every well conducted Russian blouse should. It fastens down the side with the material laid in three pleats which are repeated on the skirt directly in line. The collar is high and tight, the peplum is also tight, not very deep and trimmed with two rows of fur. The sleeves also have two rows of fur around the rather wide wrist. This is essentially a winter suit, but there are others which may be worn summer or winter—the plain tailored twill or velours for instance, with fur trimmings that may be removed or without any fur at all.

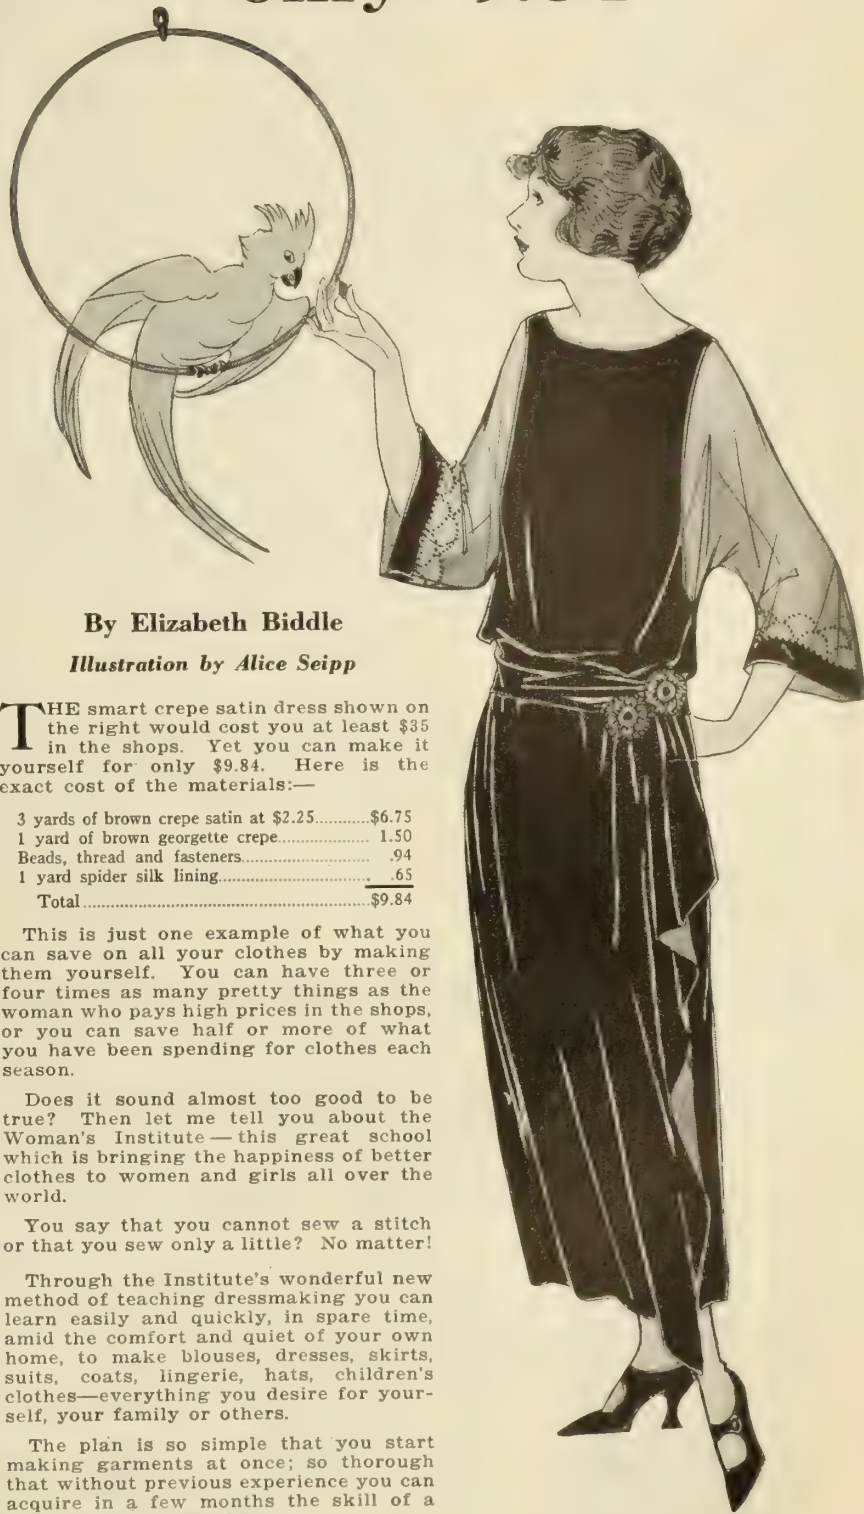

* * *

THOSE who buy the extreme coat or wrap this season will not know whether to say they have a cloth or a fur coat for the quantity of fur and cloth is so evenly divided. You will find them with the upper part, extending as low as the moyenage waistline entirely of such fur as mole, astrakhan or squirrel; others have huge fur sleeves with deep bands of fur across the bottom of the side panels or elsewhere and of course the collar. If you buy an ordinary coat—the kind you select with the utilitarian idea in the back of your head that you will make it last two or three winters, you will be confronted on all sides with models of marvella, duvetyn, bolivia and even fabric fur, richly trimmed with one of the many kinds of popular furs. It may have embroidery or braid trimming, but it will have fur trimming also. You will find many trimmed with low-priced furs that you may think are cheap because of the price, but beware of the cheap furs; better spend a little more money or have less fur and have it good. It will look better and wear better.

The new fall coats are generously endowed as to collar and sleeves and they are longer in the skirt because of the

You can make this $35 dress for only $9.84

By Elizabeth Biddle

Illustration by Alice Seipp

THE smart crepe satin dress shown on the right would cost you at least $35 in the shops. Yet you can make it yourself for only $9.84. Here is the exact cost of the materials:—

3 yards of brown crepe satin at $2.25.....	$6.75
1 yard of brown georgette crepe.....	1.50
Beads, thread and fasteners.....	.94
1 yard spider silk lining.....	.65
Total.....	$9.84

This is just one example of what you can save on all your clothes by making them yourself. You can have three or four times as many pretty things as the woman who pays high prices in the shops, or you can save half or more of what you have been spending for clothes each season.

Does it sound almost too good to be true? Then let me tell you about the Woman's Institute—this great school which is bringing the happiness of better clothes to women and girls all over the world.

You say that you cannot sew a stitch or that you sew only a little? No matter!

Through the Institute's wonderful new method of teaching dressmaking you can learn easily and quickly, in spare time, amid the comfort and quiet of your own home, to make blouses, dresses, skirts, suits, coats, lingerie, hats, children's clothes—everything you desire for yourself, your family or others.

The plan is so simple that you start making garments at once; so thorough that without previous experience you can acquire in a few months the skill of a professional dressmaker.

You will not only learn how to make clothes, but to make them as they are made in the best shops. You will learn the secrets of distinctive dress—what colors and fabrics are most appropriate for different types of women—how to design and create original dresses—and how to adapt and combine features that make clothes distinctively becoming.

There is not the slightest doubt about your ability to learn. More than 150,000 women and girls, in city, town and country, in all circumstances and of all ages, have proved by the garments they have made and the dollars they have saved the success of the Institute's methods.

The training is so complete that you can take up dressmaking as a profession, sew for your friends, secure a position, or have a shop of your own. Hundreds of ambitious women and girls are earning $20, $25 $30 and even $40 a week as a result of the Institute's courses.

It makes no difference where you live, because all the instruction is carried on by mail. And it is no disadvantage if you are employed during the day or have household duties that occupy most of your time, because you can devote as much or as little time to the course as you desire, and whenever it is convenient.

THE RYERSON PRESS
PUBLISHERS TORONTO

A BOOK of poems of more than passing interest was recently published by the University Press, Toronto, "Elise Le Beau," a dramatic idyll of lyrics and sonnets written by Evelyn Durand and edited by Laura B. Durand. More than twenty years ago, (in 1900), Evelyn Durand passed away in Colorado, leaving to all who knew her a memory of singular splendor and tenderness. As a student, she had been noted for her appreciation of literature, especially of the Greek spirit, and only her frail health kept her from taking an honor course in the classical studies so dear to her. Her friends have always wished that her poems might be published;—and now her sister has completed what must have been a labor of love, the result being a volume to be held in high esteem as the work of one of our young poets whose love of beauty and freedom made memorable music. This sonnet, "Truth," indicates the ideals of the dreamer.

"O Truth, unto thine ominous behest
Our conscious being shall be wholly bent;
E'en though it leadeth not to calm or rest;
E'en though a little human life-time spent
In vain endeavor to perform thy will Leave an imperfect, unfulfilled theme;
And over thine impassive face there still
For us no light, no recognition seem:
So, with our eyes on thine and incomplete
Years, wept or smiled, depart, as doth a breath.

And we, not ruth, but constancy entreat,
That we may learn to welcome pain or death—
As, at the burning stake of old, men stood—

Accepting thy decree as our best good."

There is a seriousness in this poet's lines which we do not find often in the productions of modern writers of verse. Elevation of spirit and a certain flaming courage are shown throughout the songs which are found in this unusual book. The conclusion of Camille's song has a haunting wistfulness of note:—

"Snug in my little bed
Under the hills I lie
Quietly with the dead.
Ne'er should I hear a sigh,
If those above my head
Sighed not in passing by."

Mr. Henry St. John Cooper has written another novel, which will probably be as popular as "Sunny Ducrow." This latest production by this writer of cheering tales is "The Imaginary Marriage," with a heroine who is impressively haughty when she finds that an entirely strange gentleman has calmly assured several friends that she has become his wife. Joan Meredyth is justly indignant when she hears of this liberty and all manner of complications follow the telling of this apparently simple little lie. The hero had his own good reasons, of course, for the story, but he finds himself in a peck of trouble before the heroine discovers his motive. There is a most unpleasant villain, whom the author is too kindhearted to kill, and altogether the story is one of the good old-fashioned kind with ever so much love-making and everyone happy in the last chapter (Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto Price, $1.75)

Ethel M. Dell writes novels which are "best sellers" and movie thrillers. They are far from fine literary achievement, but they afford a sensational happiness to many thousands of readers. "Charles Rex" is her latest venture in fiction and has the traditional hero of melodrama. Lord Saltash is of the St. Elmo brand, a wicked and mysterious dare-devil, whose favorite pastime is yachting. Toby, a waif who is the daughter of a bewitching danseuse, becomes enamored of the wicked lord who behaves in most chivalrous fashion to the unconventional young person, whose affection is decidedly of the spaniel order. The story is one of amazing adventure from the beginning, and we shall see Toby in a film play ere long. The two most prominent masculine characters in the book—Lord Saltash and Jake Bilton, have a curious fashion of pinching the arms and shoulders of their various "lady friends" which is somewhat in the manner of the cave man. "Charles Rex" will please a host of readers, but will bore those who enjoy the works of E. V. Lucas (Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"The Breaking Point," by Mary Roberts Rinehart, is a new story by one of the most widely-read writers in the United States. Mrs. Rinehart has so many and such humorous stories to her credit, that this latest novel is sure of a large audience. "The Breaking Point" is not so stimulating as the "Tish" tales, but is much better than "Dangerous Days." Mrs. Rinehart has the rare quality of "naturalness" and is especially happy in depicting the modern girl, as she is found in the United States. Her heroines are not the dazzlingly rich and beautiful creatures, given us by Mr. Robert Chambers, nor the freakish flappers in whom Mr. Owen Johnson delights. They are everyday and interesting girls, such as you know and like. In "The Breaking Point," there is such a heroine in Elizabeth Wheeler, whose love for Dick Livingstone brings tragedy into her quiet-colored life. There is a mystery of course. Mrs. Rinehart revels in mysteries and knows how to make them spin out for the length of many chapters without losing their breath-holding effect. The end is such as the popular taste would demand, and, altogether, Mrs. Rinehart has given us a decidedly readable narrative and a heroine to be desired. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto Price, $2.00).

The author of that sensationally popular novel, "If Winter Comes," will find many readers for his latest work of fiction, "This Freedom." Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson has a literary style far superior to that of the ordinary novelist of to-day, and his "The Happy Warrior" remains a pleasing memory. "If Winter Comes," while graphic in style and vivid in characterization, had a note of hysteria which threatened to dominate the narrative. Mark Sabre, the hero, was as foolish as he was unfortunate and was over emphasized as a martyr. "This Freedom" is a problem novel, as the world understands that production. Rosalie, the heroine, accomplishes wonders in the business world of Lombard Street, falls volcanically in love with her cousin's fiancé and then tries to carry on matrimony, with her business life as her chief interest. The experiment proves a dismal failure, so far as Rosalie's husband and children are concerned. In fact, the disaster is too great in proportion to be convincing. There is not a single attractive character in the book. In fact, it is a machine-made production and Mr.

Hutchinson's form of expression is degenerating into a shriek. Of course, there are many "answers" already being written, which may prove more boring than the original. We hope Mr. Hutchinson will give over these "screeching" novels and give us something in his earlier style. (Published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart. Price, $2.00.)

That indefatigable novelist, Mr. George Barr McCutcheon, has forsaken such melodramatic heroines as "Beverly of Graustark" for tales which are uncannily disagreeable. "Viola Gwyn" introduces a charming girl, who is the daughter of a somewhat repulsive person, a woman who betrayed one of her best friends, incidentally stealing the husband of the aforesaid friend. Viola, however, is not at all like her unpleasant "mamma" and the hero, who is the son of the woman whom the latter had wronged, inevitably loves Viola, who turns out not to be his sister, after all. It is a tale of pioneer days in Kentucky and the Middle West, with fights aplenty and love-making of a highly romantic order. (Published in Toronto by the Ryerson Press. Price $2.00).

"The Story of the Canadian Revision of the Prayer Book," by W. J. Armitage D.D. Ph. D., with a foreword by the Most Rev. S. P. Matheson, D.D., Primate of All Canada, is a volume of interest to all who recognize the spiritual elevation and literary beauty of the Book of Common Prayer. The necessity for such a revision was urgent, since, as the writer tells us in the preface: "The changing conditions of our life in Canada, with its political, social and industrial problems, with its influx of races and peoples; and with the development of a national spirit; in the course of time led many to feel that we needed to bring our Prayer Book into a closer relationship with Canadian life." The writer has accomplished his task with a painstaking accuracy and an appreciation of the significance of the changes in one of the world's great books. (Published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart).

"Social Civics," by William Bennett Munro and Charles Eugene Ozzane, is a book which is divided into three parts, the first concerning itself with "The American Environment." In fact, even in the last section of Part III we have two chapters on the United States in the "International" aspects of civic activities. The most valuable portion of the work for the average reader is that which deals with "The Organization of Government." (Published in New York by the Macmillan Company. Price, $1.90).

Ridgwell Cullum has chosen the wild places for the background to his stirring tales. In his latest book, "The Man in the Twilight," he takes the reader off to lonely Labrador, where making a livelihood is a stern business and the competition of men who would be masters, either of the soil or of the mills, becomes keen to the point of deadliness. Bat Harker and Leslie Standing are partners, with such a depth of understanding as comes to men who live in the far places. The falls of the Beaver River mean paper mills and pulp and various plans to these two; but there is a foreign foe with whom they have to reckon. There is a wonderful girl, Nancy, whose Bolshevik aims threaten trouble for a time, and whose mother had been the romance of Leslie Standing's life. There is adventure of the most blood-curdling nature, there is the bitterest of industrial strife—and, withal, there is a tale of true love which knows anything but a smooth course. (Published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

60,000 YOUNG AMERICANS DIE

Each Year—From Old Age Diseases
—Due Largely to Faulty Food

PROFESSOR McCOLLUM, of Johns Hopkins University, says these old age deaths, from diseases of the heart, blood vessels, kidneys, brain, digestive organs etc., have doubled in thirty years, and that younger persons are every year being attacked. McCollum also says 10% of all deaths are due to tuberculosis, and "this condition is largely due to faulty food."

Conditions are identical in Canada and all civilized countries where the same foolish food habits prevail.

The food mistakes of civilization and therefore of us Canadians—of me and mine—of you and yours—are too much "denatured," "deficiency," "excess acid," white flour, refined cereals, meats, and sweets; too little whole grain cereals, milk, eggs, leafy vegetables and fruits, the immemorial natural food of the human race.

McCollum has demonstrated that a combination of whole grains is even superior to one whole grain—because better balanced. Roman Meal is the only combination of whole grains cereal known. It supplies the deficiencies of white flour, other cereals, meats and sweets. It was designed by a food scientist for that purpose. For this reason it nourishes better than meat, relieves most forms of indigestion and positively relieves all forms of constipation.

Because of its Flaxin, Roman Meal contains more bone making salts and protein than even milk, thus it is the best possible food for your child and for the nursing and expectant mother.

ROMAN MEAL
BROSE-O

Icy-Cold! Steaming Hot
Stir 1 rounded cup Roman Meal into 4 cups boiling, salted water. Boil slowly for 10 minutes. Set in a cool place to jell, or in ice chest. Serve cold with milk or cream and sugar, honey, preserves or jelly or bananas or berries, etc. (If hot foods are preferred, reheat in double boiler after it has jellied by standing over night.)

Add ROMAN MEAL to Your Daily Diet.

ROMAN MEAL is the only balanced combination of whole grains—wheat, rye, Flaxin, and comminuted bran. It is a delicious family food, to be used as porridge, or baked into anything half and half with flour. By using Roman Meal in some way every day, with plenty of milk and some leafy vegetables (preferably uncooked) you provide your body—and the bodies of your children—with every element necessary to sturdy health and long life, and correct the "deficiencies" of modern "excess acid" and "deficiency" foods. Roman Meal aids digestion, positively relieves constipation.

With one exception the most economical

For slender figures we find the tight hip-line in the coats just as in the dresses and suits and the side fastening is considered very smart. The fastening is invisible except for the cabochon at the waist or the narrow string girdle that has two long ends and loops when tied on the side.

Gossard Brassieres

Gossard Brassieres, like Gossard Corsets, are unerringly designed for types and are moderately priced within the reach of every woman. See the new "Longerlyne" models; they are specially shaped to meet the need of those many women who require special support at the diaphragm and added length to prevent their brassieres from slipping up over the low tops of the modern corsets.

WHEN you buy a corset, you want one that looks good, one that is anatomically correct in design, one that will wear and be comfortable and make the best of your figure. Some of these things you can see at a glance. Others may be learned from the trained corsetière who fits you. But the most important of all can't be seen or felt in any mere try-on. For the way the corset is going to feel—and look—tomorrow, and next week, will decide your appearance, your comfort and your satisfaction.

What "Gossard" Means in Your Corset

This matter of designing for type is the whole secret. Gossard artistry introduced the principle of type corsetry, and now models have been perfected to take care of every sort of figure there is and prevent every sort of figure there ought not to be. Because the Gossards created for you are designed to fit your very own figure, they will never attempt to change you radically or make you conform to some fleeting style tendency not inherently becoming to you. If you haven't found the Gossard that fits you—the corset that moulds, restrains, supplements, easily, gently, naturally and brings you by hidden ways to the goal of your desires—then it is because you haven't gone to the right shop. Study yourself. Remember that there are Gossard Corsets with just the support you need at your age and weight to give you the proper proportions of the type to which you belong. Understanding your type is one of the most important aids to beauty you will ever find.

Go to the Best Store

Go to the best store you know; there you will be correctly fitted to a Gossard by a trained corsetière who will know just how to idealize your figure. Gossard Corsets are moderately priced within the reach of every purse. Because they are made of such fine materials, they launder beautifully and so softly follow the natural movements of your figure that they will outwear two or even three ordinary corsets.

"You"

If you feel you have a very special corset problem and you'd like a bit of personal advice, write to Miss Jane Hill, the Gossard corset specialist and authority on becoming dress, whose years of experience and proven ability are at your service. Miss Hill has just completed a tiny gem of a book, "YOU." It talks of personalities and becoming clothes in a way that any woman who would make the most of her natural beauty will treasure. STANFIELD'S Ladies UNDERWEAR is the perfected elegance and comfort in Underwear achieved by Canada's most famous makers of satisfactory unshrinkable Underwear.

For years, the Stanfield mills at Truro were devoted to the manufacture of underwear for men, exclusively.

When the name "STANFIELD" had been firmly established as meaning absolutely unshrinkable garments of style, fit and comfort, then—and then only—Stanfield's Limited turned their attention to underwear for ladies. Now, Stanfield's Limited make a complete line of ladies' underwear, comprising all styles, all fabrics, all weights, for every climate and every section of Canada.

And—in Ladies' Underwear—the name Stanfield stands for perfect fit, attractive styles and dependable service for ladies—just as it has stood for unshrinkable fabrics, comfort, warmth and sturdy wear for men.

Dress 1292

9984—Girls' and Juniors' Coat. Designed for 6 to 17 years. Size 8 requires $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard 54-inch velours— $2\frac{3}{8}$ yards 36-inch printed silk for lining. Like most of the new Fall coats this model has raglan sleeves which are finished with straight band cuffs. The collar may close high to the neck in chilly weather or it may be rolled with the fronts of the coat. Stitching worked with heavy rope silk trims the collar, revers, band cuffs, pocket laps, and the narrow belt.

OCTOBER PATTERNS AND PRICES

1293—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 48 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{3}{4}$ yard. Size 36 requires $5\frac{1}{2}$ yards 40-inch dune crêpe Romain— $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards ribbon for binding and trimming. Narrow panels extend below the skirt, forming an uneven hem-line.

1309—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 44 bust. Width at lower edge about 4 yards. Size 36 requires $4\frac{3}{8}$ yards 40-inch black canton crêpe.

1301—Ladies' Dress. Designed for 34 to 46 bust. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard. Size 36 requires $6\frac{1}{8}$ yards 40-inch brickdust crêpe satin— $2\frac{3}{4}$ yards 40-inch bittersweet crêpe de Chine for facing panels and sleeve sections— $\frac{7}{8}$ yard 36-inch lining for underbody. Beading, in design 12681, adds to the trimming of this frock. Chalk, colored glass, crystal, steel, jet, or opalescent beads may be used.

1226—Boys' Single-breasted Coat. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard 54-inch tweed— $1\frac{1}{4}$ yard sateen for lining. This mannish looking coat has a convertible collar which may button high to the neck on cold days or may roll with the fronts of the coat. The large patch pockets are finished with tailored pocket laps.

1177—Girls' Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard 54-inch tricotine— $\frac{1}{4}$ yard 40-inch voile for collar and cuffs— $2\frac{1}{2}$ yards frilling— $\frac{3}{8}$ yard 36-inch lining for underwaist. The dainty voile collar and cuffs give a smart contrast to this tricotine frock which makes a serviceable dress for the young girl's school wardrobe.

1094—Girls' Coat. Designed for 6 to 12 years. Size 8 requires $1\frac{1}{2}$ yard 54-inch veldyne— $2\frac{1}{4}$ yards 36-inch crêpe de Chine for lining. The roomy sleeves are joined to the coat at a lowered shoulder-line. The straight collar has tab-extensions, one end of which is thrown over the left shoulder.

9803—Girls' One-piece Cape-Dress. Designed for 6 to 14 years. Size 12 requires $3\frac{3}{8}$ yards 54-inch twillcord— $\frac{1}{4}$ yard 36-inch white linen for collar and cuffs. This makes a practical costume for early Fall wear and any number of the new wool fabrics may be chosen for developing it.

1292—Girls' and Juniors' One-piece Slip-on Dress. Designed for 6 to 17 years. Size 12 requires $1\frac{3}{4}$ yard 54-inch wool Jersey. The dress closes to the left of the narrow inserted vestee. The long one-piece sleeves are gathered to straight wrist-bands.

Sense of Style

No. 12723—Cross-Stitch Designs

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12723, blue or yellow, 25 cents (English Price 1/3), supplies 2 1/2 yards of each of the cross-stitch borders, and 3 of each of the fronts to match. These designs have gained wide popularity as the decorations for dresses and blouses; the fronts may be used to decorate the waist and the borders used for the skirt of the same frock.

No. 12707—Motifs Used Above on Spread

No. 12728

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12728, blue or yellow, 25 cents (English Price 1/3). A real lesson for the kiddie, as well as a decoration for the rompers, dresses, aprons, sun-bonnets, and bibs, are these charming little motifs, worked in appliqué. Above are the 10 motifs illustrated, which constitute the design. 2 duplicates of each are included. If appliqué embroidery is not desired, the plain embroidery stitches may be used. Outline, French knots, lazy-daisy stitch, and cross-stitch may be used to carry out these fascinating motifs.

The above is one of the flower motifs contained in Transfer Design 12728, described above. This flower was worked in 3 shades of lavender, with the edges blanket stitched in black silk floss.

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12707, blue or yellow, 35 cents (English Price 1/3), furnishes 10 large rose motifs measuring 5 1/4 by 7 1/4 inches; and 10 small ones, 4 1/2 by 6 inches. Three reverses of each flower are also given. These motifs may be worked in appliqué or in the plain embroidery stitches. Illustrated below is a spread made charming with these rose decorations. In the lower left hand corner is illustrated an enlarged rose of each of the sizes furnished. Ladies' and children's apparel may also be decorated with these.

No. 12682—Animals in Appliqué

The Pictorial Review Company's Transfer Design 12682, blue or yellow, 25 cents (English Price 1/3), furnishes 2 of each of the designs illustrated above, also extra pieces allowed for cutting. For children's dresses, aprons, and play frocks, there is no decoration that adds more charm. Blanket stitching is usually used to appliqué the figures to the background. If the motifs are worked on the background, outline or chain stitch may be used. French knots, Mille Fleur, and raised satin stitch are used to represent the centers of the flowers.

and l'aviron has once more come into its own, but le footing still foots its way along. Five o'clock simply means our afternoon "tea," as can be seen on the signboard—to name but one place—of an hotel at Garches, which informs the English-speaking tourist of the fact that there is "Five o'clock à toute heure." Hence, five o'clocker means "to take tea." Most of us have eaten lirlies in France without being aware why they were so called. They are our early rose potatoes; at first, the tuber was called l'early—the early—but it was subsequently surprisingly transformed into lirlie, the article and the noun being welded, as in the well-known case of lierre, originally and correctly l'ierre.

A funny thing it is to hear a boy called Lili, but just repeat twice the last syllable of Charlie, as pronounced in French, and you have the explanation. It must, however, be borne in mind that Lili also represents Emilie.

To come to ourselves.

Reveille is common in England, but not in France, where the diane is sounded in barracks at early morn. Le réveil, an abbreviation of réveille-matin, was formerly said, but it has long since given way to la diane. Double entendre, for double entente—meaningless in French—is dying a very hard death, for it has made its appearance quite recently, while morale, to designate the moral of troops, is, like the poor, always with us. Vive (for Vivent) les Anglais is, alas, too familiar with us.

One of the literary shrines of Italy was reported destroyed when the Fascisti set fire with incendiary bombs the famous "Byron Palace" at Ravenna, where the poet lived in 1819. The building, which was known in the middle ages as the Rasponi Palace and was one of the tourist attractions of Ravenna, is situated across the square from Dante's tomb, which escaped injury. The palace was reduced to ruins because it was used as the headquarters of the Socialist Cooperative Society. General strikes have been declared throughout the province of Romagna, in protest against the Fascisti, who continue to occupy Ravenna under martial law.

could not but be appealing against furniture of black-enameled wicker.

The question of curtains for an enclosed porch is almost invariably a mooted one; with the advocates of abundant light and air definitely and solidly ranged against those more esthetically-inclined individuals to whom an undraped window is anathema. Heavy, light-obscuring draperies certainly are not appropriate, unless when so hung that they may easily be moved to and fro as occasion demands. On the other hand, a filmy veiling of net, gauze, scrim or marquissette serves not only to exclude any excessive glare, but to relieve the windows of any suggestion of undue bareness. Shades, of course, have the same practical value: but they usually lack the decorative quality of curtains. Made of glazed English chintz, however, window-shades can be both smart and useful. They are especially artistic as a background for the very sheer curtains of square-meshed net that are now very frequently terminated by a deep cotton fringe redolent of the Mid-Victorian Period.

And what of the accessories? Books, lamps, bright-painted tin, tinted glass and lustrous old metal; an aquarium, perhaps, or an ornate cage for the feathered songster; flowers assuredly—and growing plants by all means! To these varied and colorful objects may be added with entire propriety a gazing-globe to reflect the garden just beyond: to typify, indeed, the outdoor spirit which should characterize every well-ordered year 'round porch.

done in July. There you are greatly mistaken, for early September is especially fond of freckles and you are likely to be "speckled" on hands and arms (as I was), if you spend too long in the September woods. Never mind, however, so long as there is buttermilk to rub on the spots and a bleaching cream to take them away.

By the way, I have discovered such a smooth and satisfactory bleaching cream which makes freckles and sunburn scamper away into whatever country they deserve to inhabit. There is a whole series of preparations, in fact, put up by the people who make the bleaching cream, all of them worth while in keeping the face, neck and hands fresh and blooming in appearance. Now, there is no use in denying that you are interested in things of this kind. If you are a true daughter of Eve, you wish to know all about anything new, to smooth the wrinkles away and to keep the softness and continue the exercises which give suppleness and strength, let us also give heed to the fairy tale of the small girl from whose lips dropped pearls—the softly-shining gems which mean peace, contentment—and a lovely complexion.

THE LETTER BOX

CATHERINE:—What is the use of hesitating about the matter of wishing to be as fair and attractive as possible? Of course, you wish to be rid of the sallowness in the skin. It is entirely natural to seek for its banishment. I believe, however, that sallowness comes, rather from defective digestion or some "infirmity of the liver than from any surface trouble. Of course you can have "skin treatments" and put a dash of rouge on the cheeks—but, if you wish to get rid of the sallowness, you should pay attention to the diet and take vigorous and systematic exercise. This is extremely old-fashioned advice, you will say, not nearly so interesting as information about a new cream which will cleanse the skin and make it rose-tinted forever after. Creams and lotions have their valuable place and should be used with care and discrimination. They soften and refresh the skin and the wise woman will make use of them. When it comes to a matter of continued sallowness, the complexion requires stimulation from within. A leaf of lettuce and a few carrots will go far towards making the complexion fairer, if you will only take the lettuce daily and the carrots more than once a week. I have sent you the names of good cleansing creams—but, in the meantime, look to the diet also.

BERTHA:—The hair has a wilful way of coming out, in spite of our attempts to observe every known rule of hair health. I think your scalp is in need of regular nightly massage and that you would do well to use a hair tonic every night for a while. If your hair is oily, it will require more frequent washing than if it is dry. Just devote yourself to your hair for a fortnight and you will find that such devotion pays.

Health and the Home

A summary of results shows that of sixty patients in which this serum treatment was begun early, every one recovered without paralysis; of 61 patients with slight paralysis at the time of serum treatment, all but one recovered without residual paralysis; of 123 patients with advanced paralysis at the time of serum treatment, 18 died; 30 recovered with residual paralysis; 61 made complete recovery; while the results of the remainder are unknown;

Dr. Rosenow states as follows:—

"The conclusion that my Immune Horse Serum, prepared by repeated injections of increasing doses of freshly isolated strains of the pleomorphic Streptococcus, has curative power in poliomyelitis, especially when given in the early stage of the disease, is warranted."

GENERAL TREATMENT

A great deal can be done in the after care and treatment of children, even if paralysis has taken place. Twice as much, at least, can be done now as was thought possible twenty years ago. The doctor does not despair of any case now. Muscle training, skill, patience, sometimes operation by a specialist, frequently produce great improvement and even a more or less perfect recovery.

THE INDISPENSABLE HANDBAG

of youth in the complexion. There is an astringent which helps to stop the "sagging" which every woman dreads. There is oil for the muscles and cream for the sunburn and a lotion to make the dust depart. It is a solemn fact that those of us who live in the city have all manner of trouble in keeping the face clean. The best of soap, a goodly allowance of warm water and a persevering application of cleansing cream will all be required, if we are going to fight the demon Dust successfully. In fact, Dust seems at times to be a dragon which is continually persecuting us, upstairs, downstairs and in my lady's boudoir. We certainly must have been made of dust, for it seems to have an affinity for our hands and face and all our belongings.

These preparations above-mentioned, which are among the latest products of the beauty-bestowing art, are attractive in their wrappings, especially the powder, in its cover of pale grey, with label of ceiling-wax red, on which are the black letters which spell the name of the maker. Every time we see such tempting wares, a fresh hope arises that we shall emerge from the using, somewhat more youthful and blooming than when we entered. There is nothing more persistent than the idea that we shall some day be either rich or beautiful—perhaps both—and the sight of a new jar or bottle always inspires a breath of courage in our search for youth and all its gay charm.

Perhaps, however, we are making a mistake, after all. It may be that youth is to be attained by keeping in sympathy with all that is radiant and hopeful and trusting. Wherefore, while we look for the jar that contains a healing balm

1,000 Eggs In Every Hen

Don't Kill Your Yearling Birds
New System of Poultry Keeping.
If You Keep Chickens

CUT THIS OUT

"The great trouble with the poultry business has always been that the laying life of a hen was too short" says Henry Trafford, International Poultry Expert and Breeder, for nearly eighteen years Editor of Poultry Success.

The average pullet lays 150 eggs. If kept the second year, she may lay 100 more. Then she goes to market. Yet, it has been scientifically established that every pullet is born or hatched with over one thousand minute egg germs in her system—and may be made to lay them on a highly profitable basis over a period of four to six years' time if given proper care.

How to work to get 100 eggs from every hen is the poultry system explained in a Bulletin issued by Mr. Trafford, one copy of which will be sent absolutely free to any reader who keeps six hens or more.

If you want your hens to make more money for you cut this out and send it with your name and address to Henry Trafford, Suite 342 R Herald Bldg., Binghamton, N.Y. and a free copy of his 1000 EGG HEN Bulletin will be sent by return mail.

in a cool place. Use this pulp next day for a cream soup by combining with it an equal quantity of white sauce No. 1 and any desired seasonings, and heating all together.

Cream of Celery Soup: Take the tough stalks and leaves of celery, wash carefully, cut in small pieces, cover with about three cups of slightly salted boiling water, and cook until very soft. Press through a sieve. There should be two cups of pulp and liquid. Scald two cups of milk in a double boiler with one slice of onion. Strain and use this to make two cups of white sauce No. 1. Add the celery mixture to this and heat all together.

Cream of Corn Soup: One cup corn, one slice onion, two stalks celery, two cups white sauce No. 1, seasonings. Cook the onion and celery in water for half an hour. Add one cup of the water, in which they were cooked, to the white sauce. Add the seasonings and the corn and heat all together. Serve without straining.

By following these general directions you may use any vegetable or any combinations of vegetables for cream soups:

1. Make a white sauce No. 1.
2. Cook the vegetable until tender and rub it through a sieve.
3. Combine equal quantities of vegetable pulp and water, and white sauce.
4. Add the seasonings. Reheat and serve at once. In the case of tomatoes it is essential to serve as soon as combined. It is not necessary and not desirable to use soda in making cream of tomato soup. The soda destroys valuable food substances in vegetables, and should never be used in vegetable cookery.

When starchy or strong flavored vegetables, such as potatoes, peas, lima beans, etc. are used, use one half as much vegetable pulp and water as white sauce.

Celery Toast: Take the outer and less tender stalks of celery and cut them into half-inch pieces. Cook in very slightly salted water until very tender. Drain and use one-half cup of the celery water and one-half cup of milk to make a white sauce No. 2. Add the celery to the sauce and pour over slices of buttered toast.

Carrots and Peas in Croustades: Prepare four croustades, in the following way. Cut slices of bread, two inches in thickness and trim off the crusts. Remove centre a half-inch from each edge, being careful not to break through the bottom, dip each in melted butter and place in oven until evenly browned. Combine left over peas and carrots (cut into small cubes), add seasonings, and mix with white sauce No. 2. Heat and serve in the hot croustades.

Macaroni and Cheese: Break macaroni into one inch pieces and cook in boiling salted water until tender. Drain; using a colander or sieve. Pour cold water over macaroni in sieve to wash off starch and prevent it from becoming sticky. Mix one cup macaroni with one cup white sauce No. 2, to which one half cup grated cheese has been added. Place mixture in a buttered baking dish, cover with buttered crumbs and bake until crumbs are browned. Tomato sauce may be substituted for white sauce or spaghetti or rice may be used in place of macaroni.

ESCALLOPED DISHES MADE WITH WHITE SAUCE NO. 3 AS A BASIS

Corn a la Southern: Combine one can of corn with one cup of white sauce No. 3, place in a buttered baking dish, add seasonings, cover with buttered crumbs and bake until crumbs are browned.

Cauliflower au Gratin: Break a cauliflower into flowerlets, cook in boiling salted water until tender. Drain and place in a casserole. Pour over white sauce No. 3, filling the dish two-thirds full. Sprinkle thickly with grated cheese cover with buttered bread crumbs and bake until crumbs are browned.

Escalloped Cabbage: Boil cabbage in salted water until tender, drain, chop and season. Mix with white sauce No. 3 in the proportion of one cup of sauce to two of cabbage. Butter a baking dish and put into it the mixture and cover with buttered crumbs, using one tablespoon melted butter to one-third cup of dried and rolled crumbs. Bake in a quick oven until the sauce bubbles through the crumbs and they are brown. Individual ramekins may be used instead of the large dish. Tomato sauce substituted for white sauce makes a good variation.

Fish Scallop: Two and one-half cups cold flaked haddock, halibut or salmon, one and one-half cups white sauce No. 3, two-thirds cup buttered crumbs, one eighth teaspoon pepper, one-half teaspoon salt, one tablespoon butter. Put one-half of fish in the bottom of a buttered baking dish, add seasoning and small bits of butter, cover with crumbs and pour over one-half of the white sauce. Repeat this process with the other half of ingredients and brown in a hot oven.

Cheese Souffle: One cup white sauce No. 3, one quarter teaspoon salt, one-half cup grated cheese, three eggs. Make white sauce and while it is hot add the cheese and seasonings, stirring until cheese melts. Remove from heat and add yolks of eggs, slightly beaten, let cool, fold in stiffly beaten egg whites and turn into a buttered baking dish. Place the baking dish in a pan of warm water and bake in a moderate oven until set. Do not let the water surrounding the dish boil. It is essential that souffles cook at a moderate temperature to avoid toughness.

CROQUETTES FROM WHITE SAUCE NO. 4.

Salmon Croquettes: Three quarters cup boiled or canned salmon, one-half cup white sauce No. 4, one-half cup green peas, one-half tablespoon lemon juice, seasonings to taste. Flake the fish, season and sprinkle with lemon juice. Press peas, without any liquid, through a sieve, combine all ingredients, and set the mixture away to get very cold. Shape, roll in fine crumbs, dip carefully in slightly beaten egg, and roll again in crumbs. If the mixture is too soft to shape, add a few fine crumbs. Fry in deep fat. Chicken or any left over meat may be substituted for salmon.

Peanut butter or cheese (grated) make good croquettes, but in using these ingredients the quantity of white sauce should be reduced. Use just enough to make a consistency which may be shaped.

CHOCOLATE LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening with 1 cup sugar, beating well; add 1 beaten egg, 1 cup milk slowly, and mix well. Add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour sifted with $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt and 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder; mix in 1 teaspoon vanilla and bake in 3 greased layer cake tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes. Put together with chocolate filling and icing made with 3 cups confectioner's sugar to which is added slowly sufficient boiling water to make smooth paste; add 1 teaspoon vanilla, 2 oz. unsweetened melted chocolate and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon grated orange peel.

PINEAPPLE LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening; add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups sugar slowly; add 2 beaten egg yolks. Sift together $3\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, and $2\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour and add alternately with $\frac{3}{4}$ cup milk; add 1 teaspoon vanilla and fold in 2 beaten egg whites. For filling and icing—Put 3 cups confectioner's sugar into bowl; add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk and beat until smooth; add 1 tablespoon lemon juice and 1 tablespoon small pieces of canned pineapple; add 1 teaspoon melted butter. Spread between layers and sprinkle with small pieces pineapple drained well. Spread icing on top and sides of cake and add pieces of the pineapple while icing is still soft.

MAPLE NUT CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening with 1 cup light brown sugar; add 2 egg yolks; mix well and add $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk; sift together $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt and two teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and add; mix in one cup finely chopped nuts—preferably pecans—and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven 35 minutes. Cover top and sides with maple icing as follows: add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon butter to 2 tablespoons hot milk; add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar to make smooth paste; add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon maple flavoring and spread. Sprinkle with nuts while icing is still soft.

ROYAL CREAM LOAF CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening well with 1 cup sugar; add 2 egg yolks; add 1 teaspoon lemon extract; add, a little at a time, $\frac{1}{2}$ cup rich milk or thin cream. Add 1 cup flour sifted with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup cornstarch and 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Fold in 2 beaten egg whites and bake in greased loaf pan in moderate oven about 45 minutes. Make frosting as follows—Put 1 unbeaten egg white into shallow dish; add gradually $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar beating with wire whip until of right consistency to spread; add 1 teaspoon vanilla and spread on top and sides of cake.

CHOCOLATE ROLL

Beat 2 egg yolks; add 1 cup sugar slowly and 4 tablespoons cold water. Sift 1 cup flour with $1\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt, and add alternately with 2 beaten egg whites. Spread very thinly on long greased pan. Bake in moderate oven about 15 minutes. Turn out on damp cloth sprinkled with powdered sugar—trim hard edges; spread with filling and roll in cloth while warm. When cool remove to plate, and sprinkle with powdered sugar. For filling—scald $\frac{1}{2}$ cup milk with $1\frac{1}{2}$ squares melted unsweetened chocolate. Thicken with $\frac{1}{2}$ cup flour mixed with $\frac{1}{4}$ cup cold milk; add 1 tablespoon butter. Beat $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar, 1 egg and $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt together and add. Cook over hot water until smooth and thick. Add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon vanilla and spread.

ROYAL DINNER ROLLS

Sift together 4 cups flour, 1 teaspoon salt, and 6 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder. Rub in 1 tablespoon shortening; add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups milk and mix to smooth dough; turn out on floured board; knead well to make smooth. Cut dough into small pieces to make rolls about $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches long by 2 inches wide; form each into smooth roll with square ends. Place on greased pans far apart and stand in warm place 20 minutes. Brush with butter; bake in very hot oven 10 minutes; brush again with butter; bake 5 minutes and serve hot.

ORANGE CREAM LAYER CAKE

Cream $\frac{1}{2}$ cup shortening; add 1 cup sugar slowly, beating well; add 1 beaten egg. Sift together $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, $\frac{1}{4}$ teaspoon salt, and 4 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder and add alternately with 1 cup milk, a little at a time. Add 1 teaspoon vanilla and bake in 2 greased layer cake tins in moderate oven 15 to 20 minutes. Spread 1 cup sweetened flavored whipped cream thickly between layers. Cover top with orange frosting made with 1 cup confectioner's sugar added slowly to 1 tablespoon cream. Add pulp and grated rind of 1 orange, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon orange extract and 1 tablespoon melted butter.

THREE-EGG ANGEL CAKE

Mix well and sift together four times 1 cup sugar, $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups flour, $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon cream of tartar, 3 teaspoons Royal Baking Powder, and $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon salt. Add $\frac{3}{4}$ cup scalded milk very slowly, while still hot, beating continually; add 1 teaspoon almond or vanilla extract; mix well and fold in 3 egg whites which have been beaten until light. Turn into ungreased angel cake tin and bake in very slow oven about 45 minutes. Remove from oven; invert pan and allow to stand until cold. For icing add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon butter to 2 tablespoons hot milk and gradually add $1\frac{1}{2}$ cups confectioner's sugar; add $\frac{1}{2}$ teaspoon vanilla and spread. (Use the yolks of the eggs for a Royal Sunshine Cake.)

Genuine Fuller Brushes carry this tag in addition to the trade mark. Look for both!

Fuller

A Valet in Bristles

THE Fuller Clothes Brush adds the hundred per cent touch to that well-groomed look. Curved to fit the curves of the collar and shoulders, it brushes your coat as thoroughly on your back as off, whisks out dust and dirt, brightens up the nap without wear, and never sheds a bristle. It's a typical Fuller Brush.

The forty-five Fuller Brushes are never sold in stores. We have trained several hundred picked men to demonstrate them in Canadian homes. A Fuller Man will help you select the Fuller Brushes you want — at your convenience — in your home. He shows you the brushes for both personal and household use which have become popular in five million homes. He picks out for you those which particularly fit your needs.

He personally delivers the brushes you order, and sees that you understand all the uses of each one. The next time he calls, he inspects your brushes to make sure you are getting the fullest satisfaction from them. The Fuller Man is an expert in his line. You need never hesitate to admit him to your home. You may identify him by his Fuller trade-mark button — your guarantee of Fuller service and quality. Many Ways to use Apples

BY FRANCIS M. McNALLY

There is no fruit more universally popular than the apple. Its wholesomeness, its delicious flavor, its medicinal value, and its rare keeping qualities all contribute something to its popularity. Then, too, apples may be used probably in a greater variety of ways than any other fruit: as dessert, salad, garnish or relish, they are attractive and palatable. They may be served for breakfast, dinner and supper, and an apple between meals is not open to the objections against eating sweets at such times.

Apples in Bloom: Cook red apples without removing skins) in boiling water until soft. Have the water half surround the apples and turn often. Remove skins carefully that the red colour may remain, and arrange on serving dish. To the water add one cup of sugar, grated rind of one lemon and juice of one orange. Simmer until reduced to one cup. Cool and pour over the apples.

Apples en Casserole: Pare, core and slice two quarts of apples, and put in an earthen dish, sprinkling each layer with sugar. Add one-fourth cup of cold water,

Apples in casserole with whipped cream

No country in the world produces finer apples than Canada. A specialist in agriculture has recently advanced the theory that the nearer the ocean a fruit is grown, the finer will be its flavor. Perhaps this is why the Annapolis Valley of Nova Scotia and the Okanagan Valley of British Columbia have become world famed apple growing regions.

cover the dish and bake in a moderate oven. Serve either hot or cold with cream (whipped or plain).

Porcupine Apples: Select apples of uniform size. Pare, core and cock in syrup made of one cup of water to each half cup of sugar. Stud each apple with blanched almonds, and fill the centres with jelly. When apples are

In the fall and early winter, apples are at their best and should be used extensively in the diet. While they are not difficult of digestion and most delicious raw, cooking probably increases the ease of digestion for most people. The following recipes are offered as suggestions for variety in the use of this delicious home grown product.

Apples should always be cooked in earthen or granite ware utensils, using granite or wooden spoons for stirring Mothers—please be regular. Baby's tiny anatomy should keep time like a watch.

A baby is so logical. When everything is right—food, sleep, skin—baby is no more trouble than a kitten. But upset the schedule and everything is all wrong.

Take such an ordinary thing as talcum. You know that Mennen Borated is right, just as your Mother and Grandmother knew it was right. But suppose you experiment with a very cheap talcum or one without a properly balanced formula, or with one too strongly scented, or one which doesn't adhere to the skin. Baby's petal skin will show the difference very quickly.

While we are on this matter of skin, I want to tell you all over again about wonderful Kora-Konia. It's the most amazing remedy I have ever employed in my years of baby raising. Almost unbelievable are the results I have observed in cases of prickly heat, teething rashes, or inflammation caused by damp diapers.

Kora-Konia is not just another talcum. It isn't talcum at all, but possesses remarkable protective and curative virtues, protecting while it soothes and heals. Please try it. And do send your 35 cents at once for my Baby Book. I know you will like it and get a lot of help from it.

Lovingly,
BELLE

dence, now—they tell me 'tis much practised of the French."

"What am I to take out of that, sir?"

"Why lad, you may take it that Miss knows her value. With all due deference to your good looks, you might fail where one like myself might succeed."

"Meaning, Sir Jasper?"

"Meaning, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, that little milliners, especially if they've been in Paris, may have learnt to have an eye to the main chance."

There was again much and loud merriment. The four other gentlemen looked at the one handsome youth of the party as if it were agreeable to see his comb cut.

"Gad, if there's any betting going on it, I'll back Jasper," said Sir James Devlin, with that cold smile of his which seemed to blight where it rested. "But the mischief's in it, who'd take up the wager at such odds? What? Sweet, penniless Romeo in the one scale, and rich Sir Paris in the other, and Juliet a French milliner! Pshaw!"

"Why then, Sir James," cried Mr. Bellairs. "Romeo is none so penniless but that he can back his own word. I'm ready to wager Sir Jasper this moment as much as he cares to risk that Miss Pamela Pounce—who is not French, sir, but good Kentish stock—will send him to the right-about, as she has sent—aye, though 'tis I say it—a better man! That all his money-bags will not weigh this nutshell—he crushed one under his clenched hand on the mahogany as he spoke—against her virtue."

Sir Jasper grew red in the face; his eyes protruded, his veins swelled.

"Why, done with you, you poor innocent—"

"Stay, stay," intervened Sir James. "If there's to be betting, let's do it proper, a Heaven's name! In primo, what is the wager to be?"

Sir Jasper and Bellairs spoke together:

"That pretty Pounce will pounce fast enough if it is made worth her while," cried Sir Jasper, with a guffaw. And: "That Sir Jasper has about as much chance of Miss Pamela Pounce's favour as of the Princess Royal's," asserted Bellairs.

"Now, tut, tut!" Sir James Devlin shook his head, and clacked his tongue. "If I'm to draw up your wager, gentlemen, you must, if you please, be a trifle less slipshod. You can't bet on a pun, Sir Jasper, nor you on a highfalutin' comparison to royal ladies, young man. You've got to bet on facts, my lads. Say, that a week from today we find the young person agreeably installed under the protection of our host here, in—better say London—eh, Jasper? Might be a bit awkward, too close to Miss's family, what? Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs here to be given ocular proof that circumstances alter cases. Let your charmer ask him to tea in her new abode this day week."

"Carry her off, carry her off, good old style. Tally-ho!" cried the tipsy squire.

"Capital idea!" Mr. Grinder shook with amusement. "Run away with her! Carry her off, and keep her from the hats and feathers, Sir Jasper, and I'll see that you get Little Pitfold at long last. We'll foreclose for the rest of the mortgage. Zounds, we will! Drat that girl! She's been paying off at an uncommon quick rate. Took my breath away, she did. We had to give old Pounce a couple of years for the look of the thing, you remember—never dreaming—But there! Time will be up next Lady Day, and—he broke into dry chuckling—"if you carry off the girl you'll win your wager, and get your land into the bargain. Kill two birds with one stone."

Jocelyn Bellairs lay back in his seat with arms folded, and a scornful smile on his countenance. He did not care what conditions were imposed, and the higher the stake the better for him. He was so sure of the result.

Sir James Devlin had drawn out his tablets.

"The wager's plain enough now," quoth he. "Sir Jasper Standish wagers Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs that the girl, Pamela Pounce, will give him a dish of tea this day week, at an address hereafter to be determined, the said Pamela Pounce being then established under the protection of the said Jasper Standish. What are the stakes?"

"Oh, make it worth while!" eagerly cried Bellairs.

Devlin gave him a keen side-glance.

"'Tis scarce usual to make the stakes higher than you can meet, Mr. Bellairs."

The young man flushed darkly. But before he could reply:

"Odds my life," exclaimed Sir Jasper. "Let's make it worth while! What say you to a thousand guineas?"

"Done!" cried Jocelyn eagerly. Then he added: "I'd like to make a stipulation. If Sir Jasper loses, let him remit the rest of that mortgage first, whatever it is. I'll be content with the residue."

"Pon my word, sir, that's a strange proposal," said Sir Jasper, staring with an air which gave him an odd resemblance to an incensed bull.

"You can cry off the whole bet, if you're afraid of it," taunted his guest.

"Foh!" said Mr. Grinder. "'Tis but a matter of a hundred and eighty-nine pounds, when all is said and done. Never nigger at that, Sir Jasper. Go in, and win! 'Pon me soul!' cried the old sinner, rubbing his hands, "I'd sleep better in my grave if I thought the Standish estate had got Pitfold at last."

"The stakes to be a thousand guineas," murmured Devlin as he wrote. "out of which Sir Jasper remits the rest of Farmer Pounce's mortgage, one hundred and eighty-nine pounds and hands the residue eight hundred and eleven, plus the shillings for the guineas, to Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs. Any backers? Fifty guineas on Jasper. Who'll take me?"

Squire Upshott was too far gone, and Lawyer Grinder shook his head, so Sir James had to content himself with jotting down: "No backers."

"Why, zounds!" exclaimed Sir Jasper, after he had ruminated a while. "It seems that more hangs on this betting to-night than the virtue of Miss, after all. What? The farm that we Standishes from grandfather down have vainly been trying to get hold of. That's a fine idea of yours, Grinder, odds my life, it is! A thousand guineas besides, and as fine an armful—hark ye, Devlin, did ye notice her 'tut morning in church, as neat as a chestnut filly? Foh! There's blood in her, sir, there's blood in her, or I'm no judge—"

He broke off. 'Twas a dashed superior smile on young puppy's face. What made the fellow so cocksure, in the name of all that was sly? A sudden thought struck him.

"Look you here, Master Bellairs," cried he, with a muffled roar. "No collusion! No putting your head and Miss Pounce's together to do me out of a thousand guineas! Eh, Devlin? Eh, Grinder? No blanked tricks!"

Jocelyn's nostrils quivered scornfully. "I give you my word of honour, Sir Jasper," said he, "to have no communication in private with the young lady till your week is out."

"Come, come!" said Sir James. "Split me, Jasper, we're all gentlemen here!"

The smile on the face of Mr. Bellairs became accentuated.

"I'm ready to give Sir Jasper any guarantee," said he.

"Deuce take him! He's like a fellow with a card up his sleeve!" thought Sir Jasper. "Word of honour, or no word of honour, I'll make Devlin keep watch for me."

When they went upstairs to the splendid, neglected drawing-room where Lady Barbara Flyte, her niece, Miss Lesbia Ogle, and Mrs. Colonel Dashwood were waiting to pour out tea for them, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs showed himself in high spirits.

A danger signal — tender and bleeding gums

HEALTHY teeth cannot live in diseased tissue. Gums tainted with Pyorrhea are dangerously diseased. For not only are the teeth affected, but Pyorrhea germs seep into the body, lower its vitality and cause many ills.

Pyorrhea begins with tender and bleeding gums. Then the gums recede, the teeth decay, loosen and fall out, or must be extracted to rid the system of the poisonous germs that breed in pockets about them.

Four out of five people over forty have this disease. But you need not have it. Visit your dentist often for teeth and gum inspection. And keep Pyorrhea away by using Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums will prevent Pyorrhea—or check its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's keeps the gums hard and healthy, the teeth white and clean. If you have tender or bleeding gums, start using it today. If gum-shrinkage has already set in, use Forhan's according to directions, and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

"Ah, Pamela, my girl!" cried he to himself, "that was an angry look you cast at me across your prayerbook this morning, a monstrous, unpeaceful kind of look to a man of goodwill; but if this day's work has not wiped out old scores—A 'filly,' he called you. Aye, you'll come over the fence as clean as a bird. I've no fear of you, my splendid girl, and you'll be kinder to me, I dare swear, when next we meet; but that won't be this day week, at any lodging paid for by Sir Jasper."

* * *

"Why, la, Sir Jasper, what a merry tune!" And "Oh, Sir Jasper, what a strange, pretty place!" And, "Why, Sir Jasper, 'tis the most Christmas sight I've ever beheld!" And, "Pray, pray, Sir Jasper, don't ask me to trip it with your country bumpkins, for I vow and protest I could never pick up those vulgar steps!" And, "Oh, Aunt Bab, do but look at the pink roses in Goody's cap!" And, "Oh, Miss Ogle, you're nowhere, I declare, beside Miss in feathers yonder, plucked from the old turkey before mother put it in the pot." "You're too droll, Mrs. Dashwood!" "Do you think, Sir Jasper, the buck in the top-boots would have me for his partner if I simpered ever so sweet upon him?"

Sir Jasper, moving in this fire of chatter, a lady on each arm and Miss Lesbia Ogle hanging on his coat-tails, appeared at the barn-door when he believed his guests to be assembled. The merry, tune to which Lady Bab had alluded fell silent at his approach; there were curtseys and dips and bows on every side, while the three fiddlers mopped their streaming faces and, rising as one man from the wooden bench on which they had been seated in a row, duly ducked their shock heads to their patron.

Sir Jasper gave condescending smiles and short, indifferent nods right and left, the while his eyes roamed, seeking, this way and that. Here was old Mother Pounce, right enough, as large as one of her own feather beds, in a lace cap, if you please, mighty genteel, with lavender knots. And Farmer Pounce in his red waistcoat; confound the fellow, with his air of independence! Aye, was there not a sort of triumph about him? Don't cry till you're out of the wood, Mr. Yeoman! And split him, what a row of young Pounces—a fine healthy litter! And, 'pon honour, a monstrous pretty little chit in white muslin with a straw hat! Pshaw! He had no time to waste on silly seventeen. Where was their agreeable bone of contention; where was the handsome Pamela?

"How, now, yeoman, where is your elder daughter?" "At home, Sir Jasper," answered the father, with the brevity that declines discussion.

"Sure, Sir Jasper," put in Mrs. Pounce, conciliatingly. "My daughter was vastly obleeged, but she was a trifle fatigued this evening."

"She would stay and look after our Tom," piped Susie.

"She preferred not to come, sir," said Yeoman Pounce, frowning.

Sir Jasper's brow had likewise gathered thunder-clouds. His eyes rolled inward. One excuse contradicted another; the farmer's insolence voiced the truth. And Master Jocelyn Bellairs, who had not accompanied his host to the dance, because forsooth, it might be difficult for him to keep his honourable pledge—Master Jocelyn Bellairs, who had announced his intention of taking a pleasure stroll this freezing Christmas night—Master Jocelyn Bellairs, whose very presence at Standish Hall demanded explanation; who was practically a self-invited visitor, where was he? Pshaw, did they take him for a fool? Was he to be mocked in his own house and jockeyed by his own guest? Zounds! The whole plot was clear in a minute.

New Cushions for the Home

BY M. BOWLER

To be charming, a room need not necessarily be handsomely furnished. A few comfortable, artistic cushions add much to its charm, and work wonders in the way of renovations; and as in most cases remnants can be used to advantage, the expense is but trifling compared with the satisfactory results achieved.

1. A pillow shaped cushion in black satin, embroidered in colors as taste dictates, the principal feature being the long fringe at each end which makes a graceful finish.

2. Is a durable cushion made out of strips of leather in varying colors and widths, and set round a plain centre.

3. This cushion is also of leather, bound together by thongs which give it an air of distinction.

4. Is a pillow-shaped cushion for the bed-room made of lawn in contrasting colors and edged with a narrow lace. The ends are gathered up with ribbon, and thus the cover can be easily slipped off and washed. The ends of this cushion are effective when made of deep or all over lace.

5. A Pierrot cushion is fashioned of black corded silk, on to which a Pierrot is appliqued in black velvet. The face, hands, ruffles, and ankles being of white silk, and the cap, a combination of black and white.

6. A dahlia cushion is covered as desired, and the top, about three inches from the edge, is covered with picot-edged petals, and arranged sticking up, round and round to resemble the flower.

7. Is a charming square cushion fashioned in silk and velvet in contrasting colors. The silk may be plain or figured, and can be appliqued on, or finished with very narrow braid. If plain silk is used, a conventional design should be worked in the centre.

8. Bunny cushions for the children are made practically round, usually of factory cotton, and ornamented with very large ears. The face, eyes, mouth, and paws being outlined in large wool stitches.

Secret of Oriental Color Harmonies

THE question is sometimes raised as to whether or not civilization is as destructive of the natural sense of color as it is of sight, hearing, smell and the other natural senses. When we study the color combinations of primitive peoples, we are apt to think that this is so, and it is only when we turn to the wonderful use of color by races of far older and higher civilization than our own that we realize that it is not civilization in itself, but our kind of civilization, that destroys the power of pure perception and unerring combination of color.

That this should be so is in line with the other defects of our crude western civilization. We have lost the power of discerning the most subtly harmonious color combinations because we are always seeking for obvious and striking effects that are quickly and easily obtained. This is partly because we do not see rightly and partly because in this age of swift action we do not stop to analyze the relation of colors to one another and to their surroundings. We are given to using color in an intentional way rather than as something that is inevitably a part of the whole scheme of things. We may like a certain color and so we put it into the furnishings of a room,—not because it is the color that naturally belongs there, but because it is something that is interesting to us and so we put it there. Therefore, with our dulled color-perception, we make some astonishing blunders, and, with all the pure and brilliant colors that modern science has placed at our command, we fail to obtain as brilliant and beautiful results from their combination as we find either in the work of the Oriental craftsmen, or of primitive peoples like the South Sea Islanders or our own American Indians. There is no question about the harm that we do to the work of primitive people when we replace their native dyestuffs by our own modern dyes; and we know equally well how impossible it is to copy the dull rich colors of Oriental rugs in such a way as to produce the same effects. They are as close copies as we can make, but something is lacking in the colors themselves.

Perhaps something of our defective color-perception is the result, as well as the cause, of our method of producing color, as contrasted with the more natural methods of Eastern or semi-civilized peoples. A long and painstaking investigation of this point shows some startling results. The question which started the investigation was the brilliancy of the hues used in some of the Oriental work. This led to a comparison of the most glowing of these colors with those produced by our modern dyestuffs, and the first surprise came with the discovery that the Oriental colors were dull beyond belief. A yellow that seemed fairly to blaze when associated with the other colors around it, turned out, when isolated, to be a dull soft straw-color. The blue which appeared so brilliant was no brighter than the shade of an old-fashioned blue stocking and the reds and greens were equally soft and dull. The method used to isolate these colors was to cover a fine old Japanese print, that was chosen as the subject of the investigation, with a card. Then a small hole was cut in the card, in such a position as to show only cut into strips, using about one-fourth as much date as apple. To each pint of material add two tablespoons of salad dressing. Mix thoroughly and serve on lettuce leaves.

Apple and Cabbage Salad: Shred the cabbage fine and soak for one hour in celery water, made by adding one teaspoon of celery salt to each quart of water. Drain and dry on a soft towel. Add an equal amount of apple, sliced and slice, with soft bread crumbs. Bake ten minutes longer and serve hot with cream or pudding sauce.

III. Core and pare large tart apples, fill the cavities with butter, sugar, and spice, and bake in the usual way. Cook separately the parings and cores with one large chopped apple in water to cover. Strain juice, add the juice of one lemon and sugar in the proportion of two-thirds of a cup to one cup of juice. Cook to jelling point and pour over the baked apples. Chill and serve with whipped cream.

Apple Peanut Salad: Pare, core and chop slightly acid apples and mix with half as much chopped celery. Mix a dressing of peanut butter, using five tablespoons of lemon juice to one tablespoon of peanut butter. Mix dressing through the apples and celery and season with salt and paprika. Chill the salad shredded and mix with salad dressing. Serve on lettuce leaves.

Apple and Cheese Salad: Mix chopped pecans or walnuts with twice their bulk of cream cheese, adding a little cream to blend the mixture. Pare tart apples, core and slice crosswise, in slices about one-half inch thick. Arrange rings on lettuce leaves and place cheese balls in centre of each. Serve with cream salad dressing.

A plot it was; no wonder Mr. Bellairs had that insufferable air of certainty. He and his lady-love would soon be laughing over the thought of how they had swindled him of a thousand guineas. And what a spending time they would have together!

If the revelation came swift as lightning to Sir Jasper, no less swiftly did he make up his mind for action.

It was a three-mile walk to Pitfold Farm. He would have out his curricie, and his bloods, and be beforehand with Bellairs.

Some ten minutes later he was bowling along the frozen road at the highest speed of his roughed horses, an astounded groom beside him. Purpose was setting in his mind as hard as the ice in the ditches. There was no time like the present. He had a slippery pair of young rascals to deal with. If he was to win his wager he must carry off the girl this very night.

He laid his plans with a wiliness which is not infrequently a characteristic of gross natures. Conscious in himself of a fine capacity for evil, such as he will be suspicious of every one and everything; look for treachery from his most trusted friend, and infidelity in the wife of his bosom.

He dismounted at the farmyard gate, and bade Job Stallion, the groom, drive in alone and announce that Sir Jasper Standish had sent the curricie for Miss Pounce, as it was her father and mother's pleasure she should come to the dance.

The ruse succeeded with a facility beyond his expectations. Pamela had been finding the lonely evening disconsolate enough. Baby Tom slept, while old Nance displayed uncommon wakefulness. The time was heavy on Pamela's hands, and to while it away she had had the happy thought of trying on the pretty garments which she had prepared before Mr. Bellairs' appearance in church had made a call upon her prudence.

Now the reaction which so often follows self-sacrifice had set in. She was beginning to call herself a fool, and to regret her excessive discretion. Thus when old Nance laboured, panting, to the attic chamber, and supplemented Job's message with: "You'd never think of saying nay now, Pam, my dear. Ain't it Providence you should just have been fitting on? And, oh, to be sure, was there ever so pure lovely a gown? You'll be the belle o' the ball, my dearie, that you will, and easy!"

Pamela never hesitated at all. She caught her travelling-coak off the peg, and lifted her best feathered hat from its band-box—how could a milliner resist such an opportunity?—pinned it on her auburn curls, cast herself headlong down the stairs, out through the farm kitchen like a whirlwind, and laughing, swung herself up on the curricie beside the grinning Joe.

She was rather taken aback when this latter halted outside the farmyard gate, and a portly figure appeared from the shadow of the oak tree. Hat in hand, Sir Jasper pleasantly saluted her.

"Why, Miss Pounce, this is capital. Your father and mother vowed you'd never come, but I said I was sure so good a daughter would be obedient to her parents. Nevertheless—he was climbing up beside her in the high seat, while Job shut the gates behind them—"I was ready, you see, to exercise a neighbour's persuasion, should you persist in your cruel resolve. The ball would be nothing without you, 'pon honour. There are half a dozen fine young bucks with faces as long as my whip-handle already."

By this time Job was up on the back seat, and his master started the chestnuts at a pace that only his own pride and temper would have urged upon them.

"Oh, la!" cried Miss Pounce, and made a clutch for her hat. She drew the pure keen air into her lungs, felt the wind of their passage blow with the most delicious invigoration against her face. "Oh, la!" Was there ever anything so beautiful? 'Tis the first time I have driven by moonlight. 'Tis the first time I have ever driven in a curricie! Oh, 'tis like flying, Sir Jasper! Oh, what a night! I vow I feel like a bird!"

The moonlight flooded the road, hedges and trees sparkled and shimmered white as diamonds. The sky was one mighty sapphire, darkly, wonderfully blue. The stars, fainting in the moonlight, looked like the thousand facets of a jewel.

"Oh," cried Pamela again, "I'll make a head out of it for the opera, I will indeed! Sapphire blue ribbonds and frosted silver feathers. 'Tis an inspiration."

This gave Sir Jasper his opening.

"Why," said he, "'tis a monstrous pity such a monstrous fine girl as you should have to work for her living. The moment I set eyes on you this morning, said I to myself—"

Pamela interrupted:

"Keep your pity and your compliments, sir. They're wasted on me."

"Why, how now, I like your spirit. I vow, my dear, 'tis you are wasted on such a life."

"What if I like my work, sir?"

"You were born to wear 'em—the fine hats—not to make 'em. You were born to be a lady, that's what I said to myself the moment I clapped eyes on you this morning."

"Foh! I know 'tis gentlemen's way to start this kind of silly talk whenever they get with a poor girl, but I assure you, sir, I've no relish for it. And as for my being a lady, I've seen too much of gentlefolk. I wouldn't thank the Lord to ha' made me one."

She spoke with her head up and a straight back.

"'Tis but gentlemen's way," she repeated to herself; "but I'll let him see he'll have to respect me, lady or no lady."

She gripped the rail of the curricie, not to give herself courage—for she had no thought there was anything to fear—but to brace herself the better against any further presumption. She was quite unprepared, therefore, when he turned his bloods away from the road leading to Standish Hall, and, with a flourish of the whip, sent them helter-skelter up the hill on the London causeway.

The cry she gave was one more of anger than of fear. A solitary pedestrian, coming at a swinging pace along the road which led from Sir Jasper's residence, heard it, and beheld the curricie as it topped the hill, fantastically silhouetted in black against the moonlit sky. He gave an answering shout, and started running. But he had as much chance of overtaking the gig as if it had been a bird on the flight. He gave up, panting, after a yard or two, stamped his foot, shook his fist at the radiant sky, and started running again in the opposite direction.

"Where are you taking me to?"

Sir Jasper's teeth and his eyeballs flashed horribly in the silver light as he smiled upon Pamela.

"You'll be uncommon grateful to me one day, my pretty little milliner."

"Good Heaven, what do you mean, sir?"

"I dare swear you ain't so far from being grateful now. Oh, aye! 'Tis the regular thing to set up a hullabaloo, but I'm not to be taken in by any tushery, and so I tell you! You may scream till you're blue, there ain't a soul on the roads to hear you, and as for kicking, 'tain't easy on a curricie, so, like a girl of sense let's pretend you've had your vapours, and you and I will have a glorious time together. Why, who was talking of silver feathers? 'Tis golden chains I'll give you, my splendid child; aye, and a pearl each for your pretty ears—I can't see 'em under your hat but I dare swear they're pretty like the rest—and maybe a diamond brooch for your kerchief. And you shall have a house of your own and a pair of fine London maids to wait on you, and I'll take you about my dear, and you will have naught to do in the world but enjoy yourself."

She listened in dead silence till he had finished, and then without condescending to reply to him, turned her head over her shoulder, and hailed the groom.

"Job Stallion, Job Stallion," she said. "your father was reared on my father's land. Will you see a Kentish girl carried away to perdition against her will, and not lift a finger to save her?"

"Job Stallion," said Sir Jasper, snatching a pistol from the seat beside him, "if you unfold your arms you're a dead man."

Then Sir Jasper and the yeoman's daughter stared into each other's eyes, each drawing long, fierce breaths through dilated nostrils. Suddenly he laughed and dropped the pistol back into its holster. Again he sent his whip circling. The horses broke into a canter on the downward slope, the light-hung vehicle swaying and leaping behind them. The very intensity of their speed saved them from stumbling.

At length Pamela said in a low voice:

"At least I have a right to know where you are taking me."

"Did I not tell you? To London."

"You do not think I am so simple as to believe you can drive to London with these horses to-night?"

"Why, of course not. We'll stop at Ashford, and get a chaise and four of the best postmen money can hire. We'll be in London to-night, never fear. Hark, there's nine of the clock striking from Cattleford Hill."

He pointed with his whip. Pamela saw the square tower of the little church silver and black against the sky. A lump rose in her throat. For the first and only time that night a burst of hysterical weeping threatened to overwhelm her.

"I'm lost," she said to herself, "if I don't keep brave. If I don't keep my head, I'm lost."

No strong soul ever cries vainly on courage. The anguish passed, her spirit rose.

"Sir Jasper Standish," said she, "why are you running away with me? Tell me that."

"Won't you believe I want to make a lady of you?"

"No."

"Well, then, the mere sight of that handsome face of yours this morning has made me mad in love with you. Will you believe that?"

"Neither the one nor the other, sir. You see," she went on, "I am not kicking nor screaming, I am in your power, and I can't help myself. I think you'd find it better for yourself, sir, and better for me, if you'd tell me the truth."

Her quiet tone, the perfect composure of her face, very pale and lovely in the moonlight as she turned it upon him, struck some faint spark of generosity.

"By Heaven!" said he admiringly. "You're a well plucked one. The truth you want. Split me, 'tis all true! But you're right, there's yet another reason. I want to win a wager, my little darling!"

"What wager, sir?"

"You." He grinned at her. "That spark of yours—he is a spark of yours, ain't he?—that fine young fellow, Jocelyn Bellairs, he wagered you were too virtuous for a man to have a chance with. But I wagered him you wasn't. Come now, you're a good-hearted piece. Help me to win my wager, and I'll make it worth your while."

Pamela reflected profoundly. Then she gave a little laugh.

"Why, Sir Jasper!" she exclaimed. "What sad, wild creatures you gentlemen are! It comes to this, then. I've got to make the best of a bad job." Then she swallowed hard, and said, with a still more sprightly air, "You'll give me a bit of supper at Ashford, I suppose, for I'm mortal hungry."

He broke into hoarse laughter, and cried again that, by Heaven, she was a well-plucked one, and they'd get on first class; that she should have the finest supper the Bear Inn could afford. If she'd stand by him, by Jingo, he'd stand by her. There wasn't a gentleman in England who'd be such a friend to the woman who trusted him as he would be to her.

When they arrived at Ashford, she demanded, with a sudden air of command, which became her, he thought, mightily, and tickled his already high good humour to positive hilarity, that she should be brought to a sitting-room and partake of the meal in privacy while the post-chaise was being got ready.

"And," quoth she, "let it be champagne, Sir Jasper, since"—she gave him a wide, taunting smile—" 'tis to be made worth my while."

He flung an arm about her the moment the waiter had withdrawn; she freed herself with a vigorous thrust, but as she did so, she laughed.

"Nay, drink your sillery, sir. Aye, pour me a glass. Oh, aye, I'll drink any toast you like. Have you not said it yourself? I'm the best-natured girl in the world—so long as you keep your place, sir. Why, 'tis the finest pigeon-pie I've tasted since Paris. You know I was in Paris, Sir Jasper?"

Sir Jasper chuckled, winking at her.

Her fingers clenched round her knife, the while her smile would not have misfitted the lips of a Bacchante.

"And will you bring me to the opera, Sir Jasper? Oh, and to Ranelagh? Oh, to think of me going to Ranelagh on a gentleman's arm, like a lady!"

He was enraptured. He tossed the remainder of his tumbler down, and filled himself a third, emptying the bottle. He had almost forgotten the wager in the intoxication of his personal triumph. Dash it! It had not taken him long to cut out young Bellairs. What a demnition handsome piece she was. There wasn't one of those raffish ladies he had left behind him at Standish Hall could hold a candle to her. And odds his life! What a pair of eyes she had, and what teeth, and what a skin!

Suddenly she dropped her knife and fork.

"Sir Jasper," said she, with an air of great gravity, "I'll not go a step farther with you unless you do something for me."

"Name it, my dear."

"Why, sir, send Job back with a letter to my parents. And 'twill be the best for yourself, I can tell you, as matters stand. My father wouldn't let the king rob him of his daughter without a fight."

He stood staring at her doubtfully, his wide nostrils scenting mischief like an irritated bull; she went on very quickly, "I'll not go a step farther with you unless you do. Give me your tablets—gentlemen always carry them, I know. You shall see for yourself what I write."

"Dear Father—don't be alarmed, I'm going with Sir Jasper for a wager. 'Tis a mere joke. He's too grand a gentleman to let harm come to me out of it.—Your loving daughter, Pam."

She read it to him. He went over it himself, then once more tried to catch her to him, vowing she was as clever as she was handsome.

"Nay, nay, nay!" She was the most imperative, tantalising creature possible to imagine. "Now, Sir Jasper, run and give this to Job yourself. Stay, put a guinea with it, to make the lad eager. Tell him to ride, ride, ride, hell for leather! Isn't that what you gentlemen say? Hell for leather," she repeated, laughing, as she hustled him from the room. "Don't come back to me till you've seen him start."

He went. That third bumper of champagne on the head of so many potatoes earlier in the day, after the long, cold drive, had fairly stupefied him. He went, because her strong will drove him, without attempting to analyse her motive. For the moment his suspicious brain was lulled to a kind of imbecile complacency. He went pounding forth. As soon as

For You, Also

Prettier teeth—whiter, cleaner, safer

Look about you and you'll see glistening teeth on every side today.

Teeth which once were dingy now have luster. And women smile to show them.

The reason is this: A way has been found to fight film on teeth, and millions now employ it. It is also at your command—a free test. So don't envy such teeth, but get them.

That cloudy film

There forms on your teeth a viscous film. You can feel it now. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays.

That film absorbs strains. Then, if left, it forms the basis of dingy coats, including tartar. That's why teeth don't shine.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acids. It holds the acids in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Thus most tooth troubles, which few escape, are now traced to that film.

Now we combat it

Old methods of brushing are not sufficiently effective. So nearly everybody suffers from it more or less.

But dental science, after long research, has found two film combatants. Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Now leading dentists all the world over are urging their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, based on modern knowledge. The name is Pepsodent. These two great film combatants are embodied in it.

Two other effects

Pepsodent is based on modern dental research. It corrects some great mistakes made in former dentifrices.

It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids.

It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is Nature's agent for neutralizing acids which cause tooth decay.

Thus Pepsodent gives a manifold power to these great tooth-protecting agents in the mouth.

Watch them whiten

Pepsodent will bring to any home a new dental era. Millions of people have learned this, and now enjoy its benefits.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

Table talks

By Mrs. Knox

*"For the jovial season when grapes abound
And mellow apples strew the ground."*

THE other day I happened to be at the opening exercises of one of our district schools. It was a pretty rite—this welcoming of the "season of mists and mellow fruitfulness." And as one gingham-clad youngster stood up to "say her piece" about grapes and apples, I thought to myself:

"They have appropriate exercises to commemorate the season at the schools, why not co-operate with the mothers of these children and suggest to them recipes of appropriate and seasonable things to eat at home. And so, I suggest two dishes—a Dessert and a Salad—especially good for October—one made from grapes and the other of apples and celery, and in my books you will find many more recipes."

GRAPE JUICE SOUFFLE

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 tablespoonful lemon juice $\frac{1}{2}$ cup heavy cream
1 pint grape juice, sweetened
Whites of four eggs
Soak gelatine in grape and lemon juice ten minutes, then heat in double boiler until gelatine has dissolved. Strain into bowl set in saucepan containing ice water, and when mixture begins to thicken, fold in whites of eggs beaten until stiff. Half fill individual mold, first dipped in cold water, with mixture. To remainder add cream, beaten until stiff. Fill molds with cream mixture, and chill. Remove from molds to serving dish, and garnish with whipped cream (sweetened and flavored with vanilla.)

LUNCHEON SALAD

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 cup cold water 1 cup celery, cut in small pieces
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cups boiling water 3 tart apples
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup lemon juice 3 tart apples
 $\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar 1 cup nut meats
Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes, and dissolve in boiling water. Add lemon juice and sugar. When mixture begins to stiffen, add apples, sliced in small pieces, chopped celery and broken nut meats. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Accompany with mayonnaise dressing. This mixture may be served in cases made from bright red apples.

from one cup of cream sweetened and flavored with almond extract and finish freezing.

Frozen Apple Sauce: Wipe, pare and core ten apples, and cut in quarters. Add one-half cup of sugar and one cup of water and cook to a mush. Rub through a sieve, add two-thirds cup of sweet cider and two tablespoons lemon juice. Freeze and serve in cups made of bright red apples.

Apple Pie I: Sift one cup of flour and one-fourth teaspoon of salt into a bowl, rub into it five tablespoons of shortening, mixing until the mixture is granular. Add cold water slowly, to make a stiff dough. Chill. (If the paste can be kept on ice for several hours, it will be much more flaky than if used immediately on mixing.) Place paste on a slightly floured board and roll into a circular shape. Roll quickly and lightly. Line a pie-plate with the paste, fitting it loosely. Brush lightly with egg white, to prevent lower crust from becoming soaked. Fill with thin slices of good cooking apples, sprinkle with one-half cup of sugar which has been mixed with a heaping teaspoon of flour and a pinch of salt. Brush the edge with unbeaten egg white or water and cover with upper crust. Press two crusts together with the thumb and finger or with a fork. Always leave openings in the centre of upper crust, that the steam may escape. Bake pies having a cooked filling in a hot oven and those with an uncooked filling in a moderately hot oven.

Apple Pie II: Line a deep pie plate with paste; pare, core and slice enough tart apples to make one quart. Mix with the apples one cup sugar, one tablespoon flour and juice of one-half lemon. Fill the shell with this mixture and dot with small pieces of butter. Lay one-half inch strips of pastry across the top, crossing them in diamond shape. Bake in moderately hot oven.

Deep Apple Pie: Use a shallow agate dish in place of an ordinary pie plate. Butter the dish and fill it with sliced apples, sprinkled with sugar and spices. Add three tablespoons cold water. Cover with paste and bake for forty minutes. Serve with cream.

Fairy Apple Pie: Core, quarter and cook until tender four large tart apples rub through a sieve, sweeten to taste and chill. Beat the whites of three eggs until stiff and dry. Fold in the apples and flavor with lemon juice or spices. Turn into a pastry shell and bake in a hot oven. Serve hot with plain or whipped cream.

Apple Sauce Pudding: Cream one quarter cup of butter with one-half cup brown sugar, add one beaten egg, then one quarter cup milk. Gradually add one cup of flour and one-half teaspoon baking powder, sifted together, and beat thoroughly. Bake in layer cake tins and put together while hot with apple sauce. Serve with lemon or hard sauce.

Bread and Butter Apple Pudding: Cover the bottom of a shallow, well buttered pudding dish with apple sauce. Butter slices of stale bread, cut into diamond shaped pieces, and place close together over the apple sauce, butter side up. Sprinkle with sugar and grated nutmeg or cinnamon. Bake in a moderate oven and serve hot with cream.

Baked Apple Dumpling: Two cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one teaspoon salt, two tablespoons butter, two-thirds cup milk, two cups thick apple sauce. Sift the dry ingredients into a bowl, rub in the butter until mixture is granular; gradually add the milk to form a soft dough. Fill well buttered muffin tins half full of apple sauce, cover each with two tablespoons of dough and bake for twenty minutes in a moderately hot oven. Serve hot with lemon or caramel sauce or maple syrup.

Brown Betty: Pour four teaspoons of melted butter over one and one-half cups of soft bread crumbs and stir until crumbs are evenly buttered. Mix together two cups chopped apples, one cup chopped raisins, one teaspoon cinnamon and one quarter teaspoon cloves. Butter a baking dish and arrange in it alternately layers of crumbs and apple mixture, beginning and finishing with crumbs. Cover closely and bake three quarters of an hour in a moderate oven. Serve hot with hard sauce or cold with cream.

Apple Fritters: One and one-third cups flour, two teaspoons baking powder, one-fourth teaspoon salt, two-thirds cup milk, one egg, two apples. Wipe, pare, core and cut apples into eighths and slice the eighths. Mix and sift dry ingredients. Gradually add the egg and milk, mixed together and beat thoroughly, stir in the sliced apples. Drop by spoonfuls into hot deep fat and fry until delicately browned; drain on brown paper and sprinkle with powdered sugar.

Apple Sauce Cake: One cup apple sauce, one cup sugar, one-half cup shortening, yolk of one egg, one teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon cloves, one-half teaspoon soda, one teaspoon baking powder, two cups flour. Strain apple sauce and add soda and the melted shortening. Sift together the dry ingredients and gradually add them to the apple sauce mixture. Beat all thoroughly, bake in layer cake tins and put together with apple icing.

Apple Icing: One cup sugar, one-third cup water, one egg white, two tablespoons grated apple. Boil sugar and water until syrup will thread when dropped from fork. Pour slowly over well beaten egg white, beating constantly. Continue beating until thick enough to spread, then add grated apple.

wisest and most understanding of household dogs, wandering about from one to another for a friendly word or pat, and a score of half tame wild birds fluttering and twittering in the trees above, the young people did indeed see visions and dream dreams. It is of this scented garden that Elizabeth, the sister, too frail to companion her stirring brothers in the active sports in which they delighted, sings so beautifully in many of her poems.

To a sportsman and naturalist the environs of Fredericton, the great forests and the waters, are of more importance than the town itself. The moonlit nights of October are the time for Moos-calling, and still in the wild heart of the woods, bears, lynxes and wild-cats are to be found. The great salmon waters of the Miramichi, and the trout waters of the Tobique, the Squateooks or Green River, the cock and snipe covers and partridge grounds are all fairly land to the hunter as well as to the writer. Out of such a background have come great stories such as "The Heart of the Ancient Wood," "Kindred of the Wild," and "Earth's Enigmas" by Charles G. D. Roberts, while the Rev. H.J. Cody of Fredericton has written a good lumbering story in "The Fourth Watch." And the woods of New Brunswick have attracted other than Canada's native writers. Dr. Henry Van Dyke has used them for many an essay and story, and so has Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, the famous Philadelphia novelist, in "When All The Woods Are Green," a charming idyll of out-of-door life on the Restigouche.

It may be that only one out of every hundred of the travellers who tarry at the Port of St. John knows the ancient lovely Capital of the Province, for Fredericton has not yet been discovered by the tourist. But that is only because "She has sat long aloof, Narcissus-like admiring her own image in her splendid threshold of water, too loftily indifferent to proclaim her merits to the world—so that travel has gone blindly past her gates."

CELLARS FULL AND CRADLES TOO

ON the top rail of the fence, that zigzags along at the woods' edge, sat Saucebox, the chipmunk. He was a cute, striped, fuzzy, little fellow, usually mischievous, but just now very serious, for he was looking upward at the overhanging branches of the beech tree, and thinking hard.

And lie midst the leaves scattered there on the ground, Belong just to those by whom they may be found."

"They didn't fall. We shook them off," said Chut-Chut, the black squirrel, angrily.

"It doesn't make any difference," said the Blue Jay, "The law is the law:—and who may you be to say a word about it?"

The Tree Toad

"Yessir!" said Saucebox to himself. "Just as I thought: those beech-nuts are ripe and ready to fall. If I joggle the branches a bit, the nuts will start to fall that much quicker."

But a chipmunk does not weigh very much, and with all his jumping and shaking of branches, the beech-nuts that fell were disappointingly few.

"I must get some help," said the chipmunk, scratching his head. Then he called out at the top of his voice: "Fuzzytails, Fuzzytails, the beech-nuts are ripe!"

There was a scurrying and scampering, and three squirrels appeared at the foot of the tree. There was Chut-Chut, the black squirrel, Whisk, the grey squirrel, and Chic-Chic, the red squirrel. As soon as they spied the chipmunk, they scampered up the trunk and out upon the branch on which Saucebox was sitting. Without a word, the four fuzzytails, the red, the grey, the black, and the stripy one, jumped and danced, while the beech-nuts fell in showers to the ground. They were quite out of breath after a bit, and, looking downward, Saucebox saw someone coolly walking away with a load of beech-nuts.

"Hi, there! You're a bad beech-nut stealer, Master Talky Tooter. That's what you are," cried the chipmunk, who recognized the intruder as the Blue Jay.

"Ho! Ho! Ho!" laughed Talky Tooter, "The law of the forest, you all will agree, Says plainly, the nuts that fall down from a tree, Now, Whisk, the grey squirrel, never got angry with anyone, and his eyes twinkled as he replied to the blue jay: "We're not such lazy birds as you, With tails like feather dusters;

We gather nuts, but earn them, too; We're busy beech-burr-busters."

Master Talky Tooter laughed. "I'm not mean like that," said he. "You shake the nuts down, and I'll pile them up." And this was the way the four fuzzytails and the Blue Jay began nut-gathering that wonderful Autumn.

"I do believe a pig has some sense after all—he 'preciates an acorn," said Talky Tooter to his furry friends, as they perched in an oak tree, some time after the beech-nut harvest.

This was Talky Tooter's special picnic, for he was especially fond of the sweet acorns of the white oak, and stored ever-so-many of them away for the winter. They had all worked hard, and in their storehouses were more different kinds of acorns than perhaps, you know grow in oak trees. There were sweet-kernelled nuts from the white oak, the post oak, the chestnut oak, and the burr oak. There were far more of these than the bitter kinds gathered, for the sweet nuts are not to be found on the trees in the winter-time, while the bitter ones take two years to ripen, and may be found hanging on the branches, summer and winter.

The bitter acorns had been gathered from the red and scarlet oaks, the pin,

Cuticura Talcum Is So Refreshing

A few grains of this exquisitely scented powder dusted on the skin soothes and cools, and overcomes heavy perspiration. It is an ideal face, skin, baby and dusting powder and takes the place of other perfumes for the skin.

the sound of his heavy steps died away on the wooden boards. Pamela was out of the room like a dart.

She had seen the dark pit of the back stairs gape on the passage as they had passed along to the sitting-room. She was down it now, as sure-footed as if it had been lit up. In another moment, past a pair of staring kitchen sluts and a tapman, she was out in the back yard and running along the village street.

She always declared afterwards that she had been as one guided. She did not pause to reconnoitre or hesitate at turning. Fleet and light as a shadow, she raced through the alleys of the little town, deserted this Christmas night, till she came to a point on the main road which she knew Job Stallion must pass on his homeward way, and then she hid herself.

She had not very long to wait before the beat of horses' hoofs resounded on the frozen ground. Hell for leather, indeed! 'Twas the most egregious jog-trot that ever took lazy groom and unwilling horse from warm quarters on a Christmas night!

Job Stallion let fly a terrified oath as Pamela rose out of the ditch and laid a hand upon his bridle. He was scarcely less alarmed when he discovered that he had to do with neither wraith nor high-waywoman, but with his master's prize. She cut short his "darsents" and his whimpering expostulations very sternly.

"I am going to ride pillion behind you, Job Stallion, and you must whip up that fat brute of a post-horse to something of a canter, for you've got to carry me back home before Sir Jasper can overtake us. Thank your stars, my lad," she went on, "that the Lord has given you a chance of redeeming the night's work, for I tell you it would have gone hard with any who had a hand in it. Men have been hanged for less!"

She kept him busy with whip and spur till the old grey mare wheezed and bucketed along the road at a pace astonishing for her years and size.

It was somewhere midway between Ashford and Pitfold that they crossed Mr. Bellairs riding towards them on his own rakish chestnut as if for a race. If Pamela's heart beat high at sight of him she did not avow her pride and pleasure even to herself; if her bright, clear heat of anger and triumphant determination gave place to tender, womanly emotions, she betrayed no sign of them. She postponed explanations, and issued instructions to Mr. Bellairs as to Job Stallion in the accents of one who means they shall be carried out.

"You will kindly ride a hundred paces behind me, Mr. Bellairs. I have no notion of having my name mixed up with yours or Sir Jasper's this night. As for you, Job, hand me over that tablet. You can keep the guinea for yourself. And you will drop me, if you please, in the courtyard at Standish Hall, for 'tis not too late to join the dancers in the barn. And I mean there shall be no talk on this night's work, if I can help it."

"If you breathe a word, Job Stallion, you'll wish you never were born, or my father's name's not Jeremy Pounce! And as for you, Mr. Bellairs, sir, you've won your wager—yes, I know all about it—so you owe me a good turn, I think, and all I ask for is silence, silence! My father's a violent man, and it does no woman's name any good—no, not even a poor milliner's—to be made such sport of as mine betwixt you two gentlemen to-night. As for Sir Jasper, I warrant he'll hold his tongue. He don't cut so fine a figure!"

And so it ended. Pamela went to the barn dance, after all, and danced in vast condescension with several agreeable young farmers. Jocelyn Bellairs got the rector to introduce him to Mrs. Pounce, and sitting beside that lady, made himself so agreeable that she was, as she expressed it, quite in a twitter. Mindful of his word passed to Sir Jasper, he did not again approach Pamela, but the gaze with which he followed her about the long room was eloquent enough.

When the little Pounces had nearly yawned themselves off the benches, and Pamela's poppet, Peg, had gone to sleep outright, her curly head on her mother's ample lap, it was the elegant young gentleman who conducted Mrs. Pounce to the waiting farm cart, with as much courtesy as if he were leading a duchess to her barouche. The moon was set. The courtyard was fitfully illumined by torches thrust into clamps in the wall, and by the shifting rays of the lanterns carried by the revellers.

As Pamela, standing by the cart, lifted Peg up to her mother's extended arms, while Mr. Bellairs obligingly held the lantern, Sir Jasper's curricie wheeled slowly into the yard drawn by a pair of fairly exhausted thoroughbreds. Without stirring from his high seat, the reins slipping from his hands, Sir Jasper stared at the picture painted on the night as at some spectral vision.

"Why, here's Sir Jasper!" cried an obsequious voice. "Three cheers for Sir Jasper, lads!"

Perhaps because his appearance had been as unexpected as his disappearance, perhaps because the sight of his dreadful face of wrath, flamingly illumined by the red glare of a torch was enough to choke off any demonstration, perhaps because he was too unpopular a landlord even for so many glasses of negus and so many mince-pies to counterbalance—however it may have been, there was but a poor response; a faint cry, that rose and quavered away. It was almost more deadly in its effect than an execration. Sir Jasper rolled a bloodshot eye upon his tenants and neighbours.

"Blast you all!" he cried huskily, let himself drop from his seat, and reeled towards the house.

* * *

On New Year's day Pamela returned to London, and, on the day after, a summons to Yeoman Pounce to attend at Mr. Grinder's office in Canterbury caused some perturbation to the inmates of Little Pitfold. But when he returned he brought astounding intelligence.

"You'll never believe it, wife!" he cried from the threshold, "but the mortgage is paid off! Buss me, mother, we're free of our own again!"

"Oh, 'tis our Pam! 'Tis that best of children! Oh, the surprise, father! Oh, the slyness of it, never telling us a word! Oh, was there ever so good a girl?"

"Lawyer Grinder," said the farmer, letting himself drop heavily in a chair, "kept a close mouth. He wasn't at liberty, those were his words, to say who it was as had paid it off. 'But paid off it is, and that's enough for you, farmer,' says he. 'I reckon I know whom I'm beholden to,' I says, 'and I'll tell you plain, lawyer, says I, 'I'm not a man as 'ud be beholden without it was to one who, so to speak, be but paying back what's due to a parent.' At that he smiles on the wrong side of his mouth, after his fashion, wife, none best pleased, I can tell you. As for Sir Jasper—well, he won't get hold o' Little Pitfold nohow now!"

When Mrs. Pounce wrote to Pamela in London the letter was very full of blessings on a good daughter.

"And your father is so out of himself with joy, my dear, 'tis a new lease of life."

And Pamela smiled as she read. Her lover, now very respectful, though by no means less ardent, had told her the story of the wager. Who was to say, after all, that she had not paid off the mortgage? As for the rest, she knew when to speak and when to be silent.

Simple way to get rid of Blackheads

There is one simple, safe and sure way that never fails to get rid of blackheads, that is to dissolve them.

To do this get two ounces of Peroxine powder from any drug store—sprinkle a little on a hot, wet sponge—rub over the blackheads briskly—wash the parts and you will be surprised how the blackheads have disappeared. Big blackheads, little blackheads, no matter where they are, simply dissolve and disappear, leaving the parts without any mark whatever. Blackheads are simply a mixture of dust and dirt and secretions from the body that form in the pores of the skin. Pinching and squeezing only cause irritation, make large pores and do not get them out after they become hard. The Peroxine powder and the water simply dissolve the blackheads so they wash right out, leaving the pores free and clean and in their natural condition. Anyone troubled with these unsightly blemishes should certainly try this simple method. If your druggist is unable to supply you with Peroxine powder, send one dollar to the Fred W. Scarff Company, 424 Wellington Street West, Toronto, and they will send you enough Peroxine to last several weeks.

CHAPTER VI

IN WHICH MY LADY KILCRONEY STRIKES
A MATCH AND MISS POUNCE THROWS
COLD WATER ON IT

THE late Lady Standish was one of my Lady Kilcroney's earliest friends.

When Kitty first burst upon society in the select precincts of Bath—then the fabulously rich, unpardonably pretty, delightful, audacious, amazing little Widow Bellairs—Julia Standish was scarce a three weeks' bride.

From the very beginning Kitty's endeavour had been to insert some backbone into the lovely but invertebrate Julia, and once, in despair, she had summed up the situation by exclaiming: "That 'twas like trying to mould too soft a jelly: the moment you thought you had her into shape, she was deliquescent again."

Therefore, though the connection was long and close; though Kitty, whether as Mistress Bellairs or my Lady Kilcroney, counted no party complete without her Julia; though, when in town together, scarce a day could pass upon which Julia, driven by the stress of some overwhelming emotional crisis, did not fling herself, weeping, upon Kitty's breast, it could not be said that my Lady Kilcroney was very ardently attached to Lady Standish, or that her death, sad and premature as it was, plunged her in any depth of sorrow.

The truth was that Julia Standish, elegant and virtuous, fair to look on and fond of feeling, belonged to the class that wear out the affections by over-usage. The stuff of Kitty's sturdy good comradeship had been worn so uncommonly thin, that at the time of Julia's lamented death scarcely enough had been left between them to make a darn worth while.

Kitty liked life in a strong brew, and Lady Standish wept into her cup so persistently that there was nothing left but salt water.

Nevertheless, when the news of the irreparable event reached her, my Lady, being the best-hearted little woman in the world, wept herself for quite three minutes, and then, dispatching her Lord to see what service he could be to poor Sir Jasper, ordered her sedan and had herself deposited at Madame Mirabel's in Bond Street, to order a black bonnet and mourning mantle for the funeral.

My Lord had set out on his melancholy errand with a dutiful concealment of its intense distastefulness.

He thought Jasper's case the most confounded dreadful a man could be placed in, and shrank, with all his Irish softness, from the spectacle of a woe beyond his consolation.

He found matters even more tragic than he anticipated. The last word Sir Jasper's incomparable Julia murmured to him, as, her hand in his, she left him for a better world, was to remind him of his promise never to replace her. This pledge had been exacted many times during the seven years of their existence together, but never more solemnly than in the hours that had preceded her demise.

From the moment of her seizure—spasms on the lungs—to that last breath, Sir Jasper had been in unremitting attendance. Every physician of note had been summoned to her bedside; but, in spite of all the resources of science, bleedings, blisters and cuppings, pills and potions, poor Julia Standish persisted in succumbing. He was the most afflicted of widowers! She had been the pearl of wives. No woman could ever compare with her in the whole world again. He was a blasted man. Console himself! he roared. That angel, that departed saint need have put him to no promise. She might sleep in peace; her Jasper was henceforth naught but a solitary mourner. What was left him, indeed, but to live for his little ones, those five pledges of their mutual affection; to rear them worthy of such a mother, and, his task accomplished, take his broken heart to lie beside her in the grave? "For I will be buried with my Julia," he cried upon each fresh gush of tears.

"Faith," said Lord Kilcroney to his Kitty, describing the scene to her when they met again, "she's dropt her mantle upon him with a vengeance. Wasn't it the watering-pot you used to call her, me darling? The poor lady. He caught me by the neck a while ago, and troth he soaked me to the skin. 'She was the most elegant woman!' cries he. 'She was that, me lad,' says I. 'And the most virtuous!' cries he, with another gulp. 'Aye, that she was,' cries I. And sure, Kitty, if ever a poor soul made virtue tedious and dismal—"

"Hush, hush!" my Lady Kilcroney interrupted. "Speak no ill of the dead, sir. Poor Julia, she was a fond, foolish creature, but she was an old friend, and, 'pon honour, Denis, I'm crying for her myself. 'Tis but fitting indeed, that Sir Jasper, who was a sad, bad husband, my love, and would have given any woman red eyes, should mourn her now."

"'Tis the frantickest widower I ever met. Mourn, quotha! 'How shall I survive?' is all his cry, and to see him going on that way, you'd scarce give him a sennight."

"Pshaw!" said Kitty. "Such frantick fits never last. I give him a sennight, my Lord, to—to dry his eyes and look about for number two."

"'Pon me honour, Kitty, you're out of it! Didn't she extract a promise from him, the dying angel, that he'd never look at woman again, and as for marriage—"

"And if that isn't Julia all over!" cried Kitty indignantly. "And he with five children! A man of Sir Jasper's temperament! Tush! Pooh! And were I on my death bed, Denis, 'twould be the last of my wishes to lay such a monstrous bit of nonsense on your spirits. Why, 'twould be but tempting you to perjury. Yes, you—or any other man. 'Look out for a well-bred creature, pray,' I would say, 'and a healthy, that she be kind to our little Denis, and pick her sensible, for the Lord's sake.' Now, Sir Jasper, mark my words . . . I give him a week to bellow, and, after that—observe me—he will be found at such common, low places as a cockfight, or a bruising match, with a kerchief high about his neck, and a hat down on his eyes. And he will, like as not, make expeditions to Bristol and Plymouth, where he is less known, and where a man may attend a bit of sport without his friends' eyes upon him. Do I not know your masculine ways, my Lord? And by and by he will be found at the clubs, at the cards, and the betting; and however lugubrious he may show his countenance, and however sadly he may heave his sigh when he first appears, 'twill wear off marvellous! And oh, and oh," cried Kitty, breaking into wrathful laughter, "then there will be never such a buck on the town, nor one with such an eye for petticoats, as your disconsolate widower!"

"'Tis a biting tongue ye have in your head, me darling," said Kilcroney, half admiring, half displeased.

"Before the year is out," concluded my Lady triumphantly, "'twill be the duty of all his friends, aye, and of poor dear Julia's, who care for the welfare of her children, to see that he is safe wed. I shall look to it myself, I owe it to the memory of poor dear Julia!"

Kitty broke off. Her glance roamed. A frown corrugated her white forehead. Kilcroney saw that she was mentally seeking, among all her acquaintances, for a substitute with the desired qualifications.

About the time of Sir Jasper's bereavement, that distinguished peer, my Lord Ongar, put off this mortal coil. The title and fortune passed to a nephew, and it was found that his widow, and the daughter who was yet too young to have left the parent nest, were singularly ill provided for. My Lady Ongar, who was a French-woman, was in poor health;

Invented Here

In Prof. Anderson's Laboratory

Puffed Wheat and Puffed Rice are tidbits—delightful food confections. But also remember this:

They are scientific whole-grain foods, invented by Prof. A. P. Anderson. They are shot from guns. Over 125 million steam explosions are caused in every kernel.

Every food cell is blasted, so digestion is made easy and complete. Thus every element in the whole grains yields up its nutriment.

This is real whole-grain nutrition. Whole wheat contains 16 needed elements. It is practically a complete food. Every child should eat it every day. And the ideal form is Puffed Wheat.

These are airy, toasted, flimsy grains, puffed to 8 times normal size. They seem too good to eat. But when you serve them at night in a bowl of milk you are serving the supreme food. Do it every night.

Puffed Wheat

Puffed Rice

Served Here To Millions of Happy Children

Puffed Rice is whole rice puffed to bubbles. It tastes like toasted nuts. No child has ever tasted a finer breakfast dainty.

People mix it with berries to add a nut-like blend. They use it like nut-meats on ice cream. They douse with melted butter and eat like peanuts—dry. But remember always that this is also a whole grain with every food cell broken. Let children eat it to their hearts' content—morning, noon and night.

These are days to serve Puffed Grains in plenty.

The Secret of their Satin Jackets

You have noticed the delightful smoothness, aroma and flavor of the coating on Moir's Chocolates.

Do you know how this velvety texture is obtained?

Moir's do not buy their chocolate coatings. They make their own, importing for this purpose the highest grade cocoa beans.

The cocoa beans are first blended, roasted and enriched with added cocoa butter and then ground in powerful machinery for days at a time until the paste has the smoothness of satin and is so close in texture that the air is excluded and the flavour and delicate aroma of Moir's Chocolates almost indefinitely preserved.

That is why Moir's Chocolates are always fresh, delightfully flavored, delicate.

and scrub oaks, and the willow oak at the edge of the marshlands.

Master Saucebox, the chipmunk, had hollowed out an acorn for a cap, and was making funny faces at the Blue Jay. But Talky Tooter was tired, and said:

"You Fuzzytails will help me to day, but to-morrow I must help you, so I'm going home early to my nest in the Balsam Grove. Meet me bright and early by the shagbark hickory to-morrow."

Chut-Chut, the black squirrel, was the first one to arrive, and he had a hard time climbing up the scaly-barked trunk of the hickory. When the others came, the three squirrels threw down the nuts, while the blue jay and the chipmunk spread them out so that the husks might dry and be taken off later.

The five nut-gatherers visited the walnut trees, and the butternuts, too, and they had a prickly time of it, taking the dark brown chestnuts from the burrs. They might have waited until the Frost Fairies opened the burrs for them, but, as Talky Tooter said: "What is hard to get at seems, somehow, to be all the sweeter."

The storehouses were nearly full, and, one day, Chic-Chic, the red squirrel, said:

"I don't think we missed a tree, and now we have every kind of nut stored away for the winter."

"I know one kind we haven't got," said Talky Tooter, the Blue Jay.

"I suppose you mean Horse-Chestnuts," said Chut-Chut. "I don't like them."

"Not horse-chestnuts," said the blue jay. "There is no sweeter nut than the one I mean, and it grows on the smallest tree of all."

The feathered chap led the way to what seemed to be no more than a shrub, but on its branches were nuts quite as large as the chestnuts they had found.

"Hazel nuts!" cried Chut-Chut, scampering forward.

By the time the others joined him, he had a nut in his front paws, and was looking at it in amazement. "Someone has been here before us. Look at this little round hole in the shell. Who do you suppose made it?"

"Put that nut down this minute," said a sharp voice. "That nut isn't good to eat, and, besides, it's one of my cradles."

A brown beetle, less than an inch in length, stood facing them on one of the hazel leaves. From out between the beetle's eyes was a bill-like projection as long as the body, with a small, sharp-toothed mouth at its end. It was Mistress Nippy Noser, the nut weevil. "O, we'll be careful not to take any nuts with the holes in them," said Whisk, the grey squirrel.

Then as they began gathering the hazel nuts, the last of their Autumn harvest, the funny nosed nut-weevil said to them:

"O, Autumn brings its nutting-joys. The harvest of sweet-kerneled store, For squirrels, chipmunks, birds and boys; Plenty for all who seek and more. But Mistress Nippy Noser's brood. When all the woods are winter-drest. Rest safe and sound, for warmth, for food, Each in its nut-shell cradle-nest."

JUST A FOOT OR TWO

IF you know what a bird eats, you can form a very good idea of the place it chooses for its home. If you can get a good look at one of its feet, you can tell almost as much about the bird's home, and a great deal about its habits.

It may not have seemed very polite of me to be so curious about the toes of my feathered friends, but they did not seem to mind, and they told me a great deal.

The tiny foot of the Goldfinch is covered with a scale-armor that extends well up on the leg. I wonder if this is a protection against the prickles of the thistles that are such favorites of his. There are three toes pointing forward, and one backward, all of them long, but weak, with the curved claws far from sharp. The little thistle-bird's toes tell me he is a good percher, but a poor walker and scratcher.

A different sort of foot altogether has that busy chap, the Nuthatch. Three toes forward, one backward, they are all strong, and, what is very important, they are especially suited to a bird who works upside-down. No matter how rough or unequal the bark, the Nuthatch twists his clinging feet sideways, or right around, whichever way will give him the firmest hold.

The Downy Woodpecker has, I think, quite as serviceable a foot as the Nuthatch. He works right-side-up, and has little trouble holding to the bark of a tree, for his toes are turned two on each side, forming a double-pointed pair of grasping nippers.

The foot of the Meadow-Lark tells me something, too. The front toes are long, and the hind toe long and but slightly curved, making a splendid foot to stand on.

The third and fourth toes of the Kingfisher are grown together part of their length, a strange arrangement, seemingly, but he needs just this, for his toes are weak, and unless they were strengthened in this way, he would make poor work of digging his nesting-burrow.

No bird has a more serviceable foot than the Screech Owl. With his strong, sharp-clawed toes he strikes, scratches, and grasps, and that he may do all these things easily, he can, when he wishes, move the outer toe so that it works with the hind one, much like the foot of a Downy Woodpecker.

The strong, grasping talons of the Red-tailed Hawk are particularly noticeable for this one thing—he keeps his toe-nails brightly polished. No other bird I know is nearly so particular in this regard.

That feathered fellow, the Barn Owl, with the funny face has, like others of his kindred, stout, powerful claws, and, besides that, the edges of the nail on his third toe are notched like a saw.

Swallows are perchers, and but little else. Their curved, weak claws make it almost impossible for these wonderful fliers to either walk or hop.

Wonderful little clinging feet has the Chimney Swift. The least roughness on a wall serves him for a resting-place, and I have never seen one alight or perch anywhere else. I do believe he sleeps that way.

Diving birds have a varied arrangement of webbing on their toes. The foot of the Loon has a full web from toe to toe, while that of the Grebe has each toe webbed separately like an irregular, scalloped, leather border.

Gulls and Ducks have full-webbed feet, as have geese, but the short hind toe of the river, or inland Duck is without the webbed edging to be seen on Ducks along the sea-coast.

One of the strangest of our birds is the Bittern, and one unfamiliar to most of us. The reason that we are not better acquainted with him is because our feet are not suited to the country he lives in and his are. The three front toes are long, and spread widely, and the long back toe sets flatly on the ground. It is just the sort of foot for traveling the insecure marsh paths, just the sort of foot for one who does as much standing as our queer friend, the Bittern.

The foot of the Crane is much like that of the Bittern, excepting that the hind toe is much shorter, and the entire foot does not lie so flatly.

Woodcock and Snipe have wide-spread toes, and mud and sand do not bother them in the least when they go a-walking.

Quail and Partridge have large, strong feet, and stout legs too. These are good scratching feet, and swift running ones.

Strong toes with hooked claws show their use to the hawk. A good percher, and one with a powerful grasp, needs just that sort of foot.

This little talk on toes would not be complete without mentioning the Yellow-capped Woodpecker, for he has only three toes on each foot, two in front, and one behind. Just why he should have to get along with one toe less than most other feathered fellows, is one of the many mysteries of the bird-world. It doesn't seem to bother him, however.

A little observation, sharp eyes alert for even toes, will take you at least 'a foot or two' along the way to a better knowledge of our feathered friends

NEW HOMES FOR OLD

ALREADY many of our summer birds have left us, and each October day marks the flight southward of those who find our winters too severe to make their homes with us the year 'round.

A pleasant pastime for an idle hour is to make a list of your bird acquaintances of the past summer, and follow them, in fancy, to where each spends its Christmas.

I made a list for myself the other day, a very incomplete list, and divided it into four sections. In the first I placed those of the migratory birds who winter nearest Canada.

The Southern United States is as far as some of our birds fly in their Autumn migration. One of these is the Bluebird, and I feel his departure only a little less when I remember that he will be one of the first to return to us in the coming spring.

That noisy, noticeable fellow, the Red-winged Blackbird, will spend his Christmas somewhere among the rice fields, and the Phoebe, of the twitching tail, is now somewhere in the southern woods.

The Kingfisher perches, it may be, on a dead limb that overhangs a Southern river, and, in cities and over fields on which no snow ever falls, the nighthawk flies in the evening. The woodcock hides in the underbrush on the south slope of the Cumberland mountains, and the Sparrow-Hawk and the Barn owl haunt Southern farmyards.

In the marshes, the Wild Duck, the Canada Geese, and the Bittern, will make their Christmas home, but never forgetting the road they must travel to come back to us.

Wintertime of bright flowers, strange trees, and scolding parakeets—here, in Central America, we will find some of our summer birds. I wonder if the Wood Thrush with the speckled breast has brought his clear, sweet song with him to this land of sunshine.

The Catbird is here too, doing his best to mimic the bird-voices that are strange to him. The Yellow Warbler flits here and there like a flash of gold, and the red-eyed Vireo sings joyously all day long. Bright bits of color bring to notice the Rose-breasted Grosbeak, the Indigo Bunting, and that maker of basket nests, the Baltimore Oriole.

How did our little friend, the Wood Pewee, make such a long journey? He is here, and, would you believe it, the tiny Ruby-throated Hummingbird has managed, in some way, to reach this land of warmth and flowers.

Even further South, in the Northern part of South America, we find the Scarlet Tanager, the Purple Martin, and the Barn Swallow. A long way it is for these feathered folk to journey, and we miss them, but we do not forget that the passing of the cold days will, next spring, bring these followers of the summer back to us.

a portion of one color. When the color was thus isolated from its surroundings it was matched exactly by combining the colors from the regular painters' tubes.

After a long series of trials, sets of cards were made which perfectly matched the Oriental colors, but this was accomplished only after it had been discovered that no match was possible except when each color contained all three of the primary colors. The blue was found to contain both red and yellow; the yellow, although apparently pure, contained red and blue in no small quantities, and the red had a considerable proportion of blue and yellow. The purple, although the brightest color used, had in it an appreciable quantity of yellow.

Another peculiarity of the colors so obtained was that the cards on which the matching tints were painted were absolutely harmonious, producing brilliant Oriental combinations no matter how they were shuffled. As the different colors came together they accommodated themselves to one another with visible changes in tint, not one color clashing with any other, nor was it possible, by any combination, to produce a discordant note. The fact that each color contained all three primaries gave to them all the effect of mutually reacting on one another in the direction of harmonious combinations.

The primitive and old Oriental dyes and paints all seem to have had this peculiar composition. As each primary color contained the other two, the dyes were not pure color like our modern dyes, and as a consequence they had in them something in the harmony seen in nature and in natural things. These statements may easily be proven by matching, with water colors, the colors of an old-fashioned Japanese fan or a fine old Oriental rug, an experiment that could not fail to be both interesting and valuable to the student of color. When we learn enough to prepare low-toned colors in this way, rich and brilliant color combinations will be possible as well as the duller, softer harmonies which we find so restful. It may be possible also that when we take the time to do this we will reap as a result a much keener and purer perception of color.

ROYAL YEAST CAKES

Canadian Made

As a health builder, Royal Yeast is gaining in popularity every day. It is a food - not a medicine. It supplies the vitamins which the diet may lack. Royal Yeast is highly beneficial in cases where the system seems "run down". Royal Yeast is the richest known source of vitamins, and when taken into the system acts as a corrective agent. Royal Yeast Cakes are recommended for their purity and wholesomeness. It is the purest, the most convenient and economical yeast on the market.

Two to four Royal Yeast Cakes a day will work wonders. A full day's supply can easily be prepared at one time by using one glass luke warm water and teaspoon sugar to each yeast cake. Allow to stand over night in moderately warm room. In the morning stir well and pour off liquid. Place in refrigerator or other cool place and drink at intervals as desired throughout the day.

and much sympathy was felt for her situation, as well as for that of the little Lady Selina, who, on the threshold of presentation to the world, found herself suddenly at so great a disadvantage. It was true that both her sisters had made good marriages; one to Lord Verney, who had a house in town as well as country property; the other to Squire Day, of Queen's Compton. But then, as Kitty Kilcroney said, who, that had a heart in her breast, could suggest placing a high-spirited girl under the charge of Susan Verney? "For sure, my dear, somewhere back there must have been a slave-driver among her ancestors. And as for Nan Day, was she not lost in domestic bliss? and no one ought to expect pretty Selina to bury herself in haycocks and babies—other people's babies!"

It was owing to the Viscountess Kilcroney's influence that the young lady was offered a post about the Princess Augusta, the second of the bevy of beautiful Royal Princesses; for, since assuming her duties as Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Charlotte, Kitty had vastly pleased Her Majesty in that capacity.

Not indeed that my Lady Kilcroney, who now had her own personal experience to go by, approved of Court life as a career for any young unmarried female. 'Twas monstrous cramping, she declared to those who had her complete confidence; and the Royals, perfect beings as they were, and gratifying as it was to be chosen to serve them, had a fashion of very naturally considering themselves paramount, and their favour the chief benefit of existence.

"I'll not have the child's youth sucked out of her," quoth my Lady, in the strict privacy of her chamber, to the grunting Denis, who himself disliked the Court and all its ways with a large intolerance, born of its demands on his Kitty. "But a year, my love, 'twill give her a certain stamp of elegance. We can scarce look for a very great marriage for our Selina, with never two farthings in her pocket, but there are a vast of pleasant gentlemen of the second rank who water at the mouth at the thought of anything favoured by Royalty."

It was not till Lady Selina had been some nine months in her new post, and Sir Jasper Standish well nigh a year a widower, that the great idea flashed into Kitty's mind.

Sir Jasper was a personable man, and had not yet topped thirty-five; a very prime age for a bridegroom with the greenness of youth cast off, the tedium of maturity not yet as much as dawned. With your man of thirty-five it is a point of honour to be as ready with the generosity of youth as the lad of twenty, especially should his fancy turn to sweet seventeen. He will have gained, however, a vast experience, and, unless he be a fool, a seasoned judgment. Sir Jasper was no fool; and though he had so far justified my Lady Kilcroney's prognostications as to be more conspicuous at any dashing sport-meeting than ever before, he kept chiefly in the company of his own sex, and never so much as noticed the passage of the most flouncing petticoat; and who was more likely to know than Kitty, since she was the only lady in the world whose society the widower now frequented?

At first the talk would be all of his Julia; but in a little while lamentations gave way to more cheerful discourse anent the young family.

It was in her capacity of godmother to little Kate Standish that, a due interval having elapsed since the loss of their ever-to-be-regretted Julia, Kitty Kilcroney first addressed Sir Jasper on the subject of a second marriage. She was, of course, quite prepared for the shocked refusal which met her.

Was it possible my Lady Kilcroney should not be aware of the solemn vow, by which he had pledged himself to his Dying Treasure, to remain ever faithful to her memory?

My Lady Kilcroney was very well aware of it. Heaven knew, she exclaimed, rolling her pansy eyes towards the ceiling of her drawing-room—she was for the while free of her Court duties, and was established in the Hertford Street mansion—Heaven knew, if ever there was anyone in the world who could appreciate what a second marriage meant to a true mourner it was she! When Bellairs went—"Ah, you never knew my first, Sir Jasper! The most excellent, the most estimable, the most generous and noble-minded of men. There was not a condition in his will, I do assure you! Everything, everything left to me! 'My dearest wife, Kitty, in token of the perfect happiness she gave me.' Those were his words, Sir Jasper. But a year's happiness, alas! and he, poor seraph, scarce able to endure anyone in the room with him with the gout so cruel settled in his joints that, if you'll believe me, his feet were like nothing so much as warming-pans, and his hands—my poor Bellairs' hands, why, there were days when he could not have borne that a butterfly should settle on them! When my cherished martyr was released from his sufferings, did I not, like you, vow in my heart that I never, never would replace him?"

Here Kitty fixed her eyes upon Sir Jasper's lugubrious countenance, and, positively, though her tone was filled with such pious melancholy, they twinkled.

"I fail to see the analogy, my Lady Kilcroney," said he huffily. "My Julia was as young as she was fair, as elegant in form as she was virtuous in character."

"True, true, Sir Jasper! Bellairs became, very shortly after our espousals, a wreck, an absolute wreck. But he retained the most admirable amiability of temper. 'Twas indeed that which first drew my heart to him. 'My dear,' he said to me, 'when I heard that my poor old friend Ned had gone smash, and shot himself, and left a little daughter without a farthing to buy a ribbon with, I cast about in my mind what I should do to help her. And, faith, I can think of no better way, my dear, than to make a rich widow of you.' And then he set to laughing in his droll, wheezing way. 'I'm game for a year,' says he, 'if you can stand the old man for a year,' says he. 'I'll put you in the way of getting the best the world can give you; honour and good repute, and wealth and a young husband in due time—better than if your poor father had kept out of indigo. If you'll trust me, I'll trust you,' says he. And my dear Bellairs kept his word royally. He'd never so much as a suspicion of me; or ought but a smile for my pleasures." Here a tear suddenly flashed. "I'm proud to say," cried Kitty. "I deserved his confidence. Is there ever anything so beautiful in life as wedded trust?"

Sir Jasper went home thoughtful. His Julia had had every merit, but if she had had also just the tiniest part of Bellairs' the Nabob's generosity of mind, would he, could he have so often—as alas! he had! But there were times when he had been goaded, indubitably driven, to seek distraction. Angel as she had been, to what screaming vapours, what swoons had she not treated him? How often also—here he held his head higher, and made a knowing thrust at a door post with his gold-headed walking-stick as he went by—had she not suspected the vilest deeds when he had been as innocent as the lambs in the field?

"You cannot," said Sir Jasper, sapiently to himself, as his marital crimes appeared before him suddenly transmogrified into peccadilloes. "You cannot be said to betray a trust that has never been reposed in you."

Next time my Lady spoke of matrimony to the bereaved, it was in the tone of one who regrets a rash determination, but recognises its binding quality.

"What a pity, Sir Jasper, you should have been led into such fond folly! To take such a vow! Irrevocable of course. Who would have the dreadful courage to suggest the breaking of a pledge to one who is now among the saints. What if a father's duty points one way? that death-bed obligation sternly points the other."

She pitied Sir Jasper—she did indeed. How was a man, and he so young, to deal with five children, and they with all the difficulties of life before them: character, education, and—heavens!—illnesses? Measles and mumps, hecetics and whooping coughs, and all the rest of it! "Poor Julia, could she but see now to what her intemperate passion for you has led! If our Julia had a fault—dare I say it, Sir Jasper?—she was a little, leetle inclined to jealousy."

When Kitty returned to Queen's Lodge, to take up service with Her Majesty, Sir Jasper and she had come to discussing very freely the kind of person who might be regarded as worthy to fill their dearest Julia's shoes.

Kitty was full of suggestions, but, one way or another, the paragons enumerated by the lady were never to the gentleman's taste.

When Lady Selina joined the Court circle, she was, if truth be told, the very last young female whom Kitty could in conscience have selected as a fitting companion for a widower of Sir Jasper's kidney, or the proper kind of stepmother to his peevish brats. Nevertheless when the idea came, it was with the brilliant conviction of a flash of lightning.

Selina Vereker was not dark and masterful like Susan Verney, nor was she soft and warm-hearted, all feminine impulse and charm, like Nan Day. She was a bold piece, Kitty had decided from the first, with a short nose and a short temper, and hair under her powder as blazing as Sir Jasper's own, and a grey eye that possessed a certain cold, reflective audacity which made Kitty thoughtful. She was a judge of minxes. Withal the creature if not pretty, was mighty attractive; with a little head on a white throat, and a way of tossing it; slim, long limbs like a boy, and a freedom of movement inside her voluminous skirts that was almost unbecoming to her sex. And the tiresome child was in a hundred scrapes, and in Royalty's black books before she had been a fortnight at her duties. This was unpleasant for Kitty, who had recommended her. And, as she had a kind heart, it filled her with apprehension for the future. For if anything so awful were to happen as that Selina should fall into serious disgrace and be dismissed from Court, what in the world would become of her? So poor, so naughty, and so innocent; with a pair of selfish sisters, and her mother retired to a convent! Why, with Royal displeasure upon her, never could she hope to ally herself to a genteel family!

Sir Jasper! Was not the man to her hand? He deserved a wife with some fire in her, after having so long endured the deliquescent Julia, and he deserved too, sad rake that he was, something with a temper of her own to keep him to attention and in his place.

"To heel, sir, or beware, there are other fine fellows in the world who are ready to appreciate what you have the bad taste to neglect."

Her mind made up, Kitty set to work with a transparent artifice, to which only the blundering male would fall a prey.

"Pray come to tea, to-morrow, sir—or stay, perhaps better not, for I have Princess Augusta's Maid-of-Honour, the little Selina Vereker, and, oh no, I would not for the world that you should meet!"

"And why, pray?"

"La, Sir Jasper, and you on the lookout for a new Lady Standish! You might fall in love with her, to be sure."

"And what then, my Lady Kilcroney?"

"Oh, Sir Jasper, Sir Jasper, that would never do!"

"And why not, ma'am?"

"But eighteen, sir."

"I see no objection there."

"Fie, Sir Jasper, and you turned thirty-six!"

"But thirty-five my last birthday, ma'am, as I'm a sinner."

"A sinner, indeed, Sir Jasper, and now you have it. What? Would you, sir, mate with innocence, guilelessness; lamb-like light-heartedness, and sprightliness; you with—?"

"Come, come, my Lady Kilcroney. I've not been a model husband, I dare say."

"I dare say not, sir. Heavens, my poor Julia!"

"Your poor Julia, ma'am, would have driven a saint—Pshaw! She was too good for me!"

"Believe me, sir, you should wed a young lady of some experience, if not a widow; a staid female, sir."

"Thank you, my Lady, I'm vastly obliged, I'm sure."

"And you so jealous, Sir Jasper, who could scarce even trust virtue's self, in the shape of Julia! La, to think of you with Selina—such beauty, Sir Jasper; such grace, such charm, so ready to take the pleasure of her years, so pure ignorant of the world's ways."

"Good heavens, my Lady Kilcroney, if I do not come to your tea-party to-morrow, 'twill be that I am a dead man."

As to the special subjects to select, this depends largely on the child's individuality, but generally speaking, children love pictures of Mothers and Babies. And what a big field this opens up in the choice of a picture; the Old Masters painted this subject over and over again—Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci, Correggio. In later times Carriere, the French painter, made this a study of years. Millet, with his pictures of French peasant-life, shows it in many different forms. Children also are attracted by pictures of other little girls and boys. Why not try Sargent's picture "Carnation Lily, Lily Rose," with its additional charm of the garden, or Manet's "Boy Blowing Bubbles" a real boy painted with sure vital brush strokes or, by way of contrast "Little Rose by Lyme Regis" by Whistler.

If they know the sea at all, a copy of one of Winslow Homer's marines with its sense of awe before the vastness and power of the ocean can't fail in its appeal. For wealth of color a reproduction of one of Brangwin's would be fine, and if you particularly want illustrations of some favorite book, many really fine artists have given time to this kind of work—Arthur Rackham with his wonderful pictures for "Peter Pan"; Edmund Dulac, with his fanciful drawings for the Arabian Nights, and other themes, and Maxfield Parrish with his fine color effects.

But when the pictures are satisfactorily selected, one must exercise great care in hanging them. Just as watching a crowd tires one because there is so much to see, there is no sense of rest, similarly a wall covered with all sorts of pictures arranged without any idea of balance or of producing an ordered effect, will have the same result. Hang each picture in such a way that it can be seen and enjoyed without fighting for recognition with a motley array of others. Your whole wall should be arranged so it will have a well-balanced restful appearance—a thing of beauty for the eye to rest upon.

Use Johnson's Paste Prepared Wax for polishing floors of all kinds and linoleum.

Use Johnson's Liquid Prepared Wax for polishing furniture, pianos, phonographs, woodwork, linoleum, leather and automobiles.

Johnson's Powdered Wax makes perfect dancing floors.

EVERY room needs the brightening touch of Johnson's Prepared Wax. It will rejuvenate your furniture, woodwork, floors and linoleum, and give an air of immaculate cleanliness. Johnson's Prepared Wax imparts a beautiful, artistic lustre of great beauty and durability. It gives a hard, dry, velvety polish which will not collect dust or lint.

Johnson's Prepared Wax cleans, polishes, preserves and protects—all in one operation. Forms a thin, protecting coat over the finish, similar to the service rendered by plate glass over a desk or dresser top.

Johnson's Liquid Prepared Wax is the ideal furniture polish. Removes the bloom and takes all the drudgery from dusting. Does not finger print.

BEAUTIFUL FLOORS are largely a matter of prevention. Doorways, stair-treads and tracks should be polished frequently. This requires no great amount of time or effort if Johnson's Prepared Wax and Weighted Polishing Brush are used.

Is your linoleum dull and dead looking? A coat of Johnson's Prepared Wax will make it look better and last longer. Johnson's Wax prevents linoleum from cracking and blistering. Brings out the pattern and color and protects linoleum from wear.

Johnson's Weighted Floor Polishing Brush is just the thing for women's use. It is properly weighted and as easy to handle as a broom. Is a great help in caring for floors, and linoleum. Will last for years and save many times its cost. To introduce these Brushes your dealer will give you a $1 can of Johnson's Prepared Wax FREE with each Johnson Brush. The Price of the Brush is $3.50 (Alberta and British Columbia $3.75).

YOUTHFUL maturity may exert a charm which youth alone can't rival. And certainly no woman should allow her youthful freshness to fade just when the joy of living should be at its height.

Keep your schoolgirl complexion and you can forget the passing years. The woman with a fresh, radiant skin will always seem young.

How to keep it—this is simple, as Cleopatra could tell you. The secret lies in daily intelligent care which will make beauty life-long.

How Cleopatra kept young

Girlhood days had long passed when the beautiful Egyptian reached the height of her fame and loveliness. Her charm grew greater with the years.

She knew how to care for and keep the smooth, flawless complexion which makes the possessor seem ever young.

Her method—thorough cleansing with the soothing oils discovered in ancient Egypt.

Whatever cosmetics this queen of beauty used, the foundation was a skin free from all injurious accumulations.

Why your face needs washing

Because the accumulation of dirt, oil and perspiration must be removed or they will ruin your skin. To let them collect in the pores is to invite complexion troubles.

Inevitably such deposits soon cause enlarged pores and coarse texture results. The dirt forms blackheads and carries infections which cause blotches.

The more powder you use to conceal this condition the worse it grows, for this only increases the clogging. Lotions and cold creams won't help—you must remove the cause.

Gentle cleansing with Palmolive will soon improve the condition, and don't be afraid to be thorough.

Massage the cosmetic lather into the skin so that it may remove every trace of injurious soil. If your skin is dry, apply cold cream after cleansing. Oily skins won't require such applications.

Throat, neck, shoulders

Need the same beautifying cleansing, for complexion beauty doesn't stop with the face.

Bathe with Palmolive and keep your skin smooth and white. It is a luxury all can afford.

For with all its fineness, its mild, soothing qualities, its gentle, cosmetic action, Palmolive isn't an expensive soap. Popularity keeps the price low.

10 cents a cake

This modest sum is possible through gigantic production which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night, and the importation of the bland, mild oils in reducing volume.

Thus the finest facial soap, which if made in small quantities would cost at least 25 cents, is offered at the price of ordinary soap.

Volume and efficiency produce 25-cent quality for

EDITORIAL CHAT

THERE are few dates which this generation of Canadians will remember more vividly than the eleventh of November—Armistice Day, as so many now call it. The four years, which have passed, since that joyful yet solemn Monday, when the early bells proclaimed the ceasing of strife, have been marked by many changes and momentous conferences; but the world hopes that out of them all may come the peace for which we have yearned, through all the strife and contention.

Especially, in this month of November, do we remember those thousands of Canadians who sleep far from the land of their love, fallen in the cause of freedom and righteousness. "Their name liveth forevermore," as said the writer of old, and every Canadian should feel a pride and an inspiration in the honor lists which confront him in church or school, in bank or shop, that tell the story of how our young nation did her share in the Great War.

On this page is reproduced a memorial tower erected at that historic spot, Niagara-on-the-Lake. The upper illustration on the page shows the Cambridge War Memorial, unveiled in England by His Royal Highness, the Duke of York, on July third. This statue, called "The Homecoming," is the work of Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, the eminent Canadian sculptor, who was born in Almonte, Ontario, a town whose High School has long been noted for its gifted boys. Dr. McKenzie graduated in medicine from McGill University. After training in the Montreal hospitals, and at sea as ship's surgeon, he was appointed Assistant Demonstrator of Anatomy at McGill. He rapidly qualified for advancement to Senior Demonstrator and probably would have become a lecturer in Anatomy but for his acceptance of the Chair of Physical Education at the University of Pennsylvania.

When Dr. McKenzie first entered upon the work of sculpture, it was through his desire to reduce the theoretical figures of Dr. Hall Phillips of Amherst College to their actual form. Dr. McKenzie made a model figure, embodying the measurements of eighty-nine champion sprinters. This figure, known as "The Sprinter," brought renown, and the sculptor's achievements have received recognition in many countries.

"The statue unveiled last July in England shows a private soldier in full kit on his triumphal return after the War," explained Dr. McKenzie. "With discipline relaxed, he is striding along bare-headed, helmet in hand, a Boche helmet as a trophy is slung on his back and partly concealed by a laurel wreath carelessly flung over the rifle barrel. In his hand he holds a rose. Another rose, thrown to him, has fallen to the ground. His head is turned to the side, his expression is alert, happy and slightly quizzical, and his lips are slightly parted, as if he has recognized an old friend in the welcoming crowd and is about to call to him. In this face I have tried to express the type on whom the future of England must depend. Blond, with hair wavy rather than curly, head well-rounded, forehead slightly flat, the boss over the eyes large, but not so developed as it will be in later life. The brows are straight, the nose not continuous with the brow as in the Greek, the mouth large and lips not too full."

This Cambridge War Memorial was unveiled in England by His Royal Highness, the Duke of York, on July third. This statue called "The Homecoming," is the work of Dr. R. Tait McKenzie, an eminent Canadian sculptor, who was born in Almonte, Ontario.

Soldiers' Memorial, Niagara-on-the-Lake

Dr. McKenzie has been entrusted with the execution of the memorial statue, to be erected in front of the House of Parliament in Ontario, to the late Lieutenant-Colonel G. H. Baker, M.P. for Brome, Quebec. This officer was killed at Sanctuary Wood on June second, 1916, while with his regiment, the Fifth Canadian Mounted Rifles. The statue represents an officer standing "at ease" and while it is to suggest the general proportions of Colonel Baker, it is not intended as an accurate personal likeness, but rather an idealized figure of the Canadian officer. It is interesting to note that Dr. McKenzie has been commissioned to execute a Victory Memorial, to be erected at Almonte, his native town.

The years since that Armistice Day have not brought the settlement for which the world had hoped, and there are still anxious days for those who yearn for peace and progress. The war cloud in the Near East is not the only threatening aspect, but the world of womankind is praying that further strife may be averted.

As the month of November comes, with its memory of Armistice, the spirit of Thanksgiving is once more abroad. Compared with many other countries in this war-torn world, Canada has a happy and easy lot, and has little cause to dread the future. Work there is, a-plenty, in this new land of ours, but there is also an abundance, in reward for the worker.

Memories of many sacrifices in war years come to us in autumn's closing month, memories of mingled sorrow and gladness. We are proud of our youth in Canada:—of our boys who so willingly went at the call of a cause which meant a struggle for liberty and right. The sailing of the first contingent will not soon be forgotten and the memory of the readiness and the valour of Canada's young manhood should inspire us all to service in the day of our country's need. For the gallant lads who lie in Flanders, we may say with the writer of "Jimmy—Killed in Action,"

"Horses he loved, and laughter and the sun,
A song, wide spaces and the open air;
The trust of all dumb things he won,
And never knew the luck too good to share.

"His were the simple heart and open hand,
And honest faults he never strove to hide:
Problems of life he could not understand,
But, as a man would wish to die, he died.

"Now, though he will not ride with us again,
His merry spirit seems our comrade yet,
Freed from the power of weariness or pain,
Forbidding us to mourn—or to forget."

There are various ways of observing Armistice Day, but there is no better memorial service in honor of those who have given their lives in the Great War than the devotion of part of the anniversary to those soldiers still in hospital or in need of home cheer and comfort. November eleventh should be a great rallying day for the veterans and their friends, for the memory of those four war-darkened years should form a bond such as no days of peace, no season of pleasure could ever make. We are always in debt to those who fought for our homes and our liberties, and the debt to the dead can be paid most honorably when we show attention and care to their comrades with us.

Making it unattractive to germs by taking their "food" away!

Fels-Naptha Soap discourages germs by washing clothes so clean and sanitary that germs have no place to feed and breed. For the real naptha in Fels-Naptha weaves through and through the threads like some invisible shuttle, loosening the dirt and body-oils for the snowy suds to flush away.

Clothes washed with Fels-Naptha get a double cleaning—one with soap and water; one with naptha, that quick, safe, thorough dirt-loosener used by dry-cleaners to cleanse and freshen filmiest fabrics.

Fels-Naptha takes the drudgery out of wash-day. Use any method of washing you like with Fels-Naptha and get better results. A simple, labor-saving way is to wet the clothes; soap them; roll and soak them; rub only very soiled parts; rinse them. The naptha does its work, then vanishes, leaving the clothes sweet and sanitary with that clean-clothes smell.

Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners—a way that has never been successfully imitated! Begin using it today. Directions inside wrapper.

THE GOLDEN BAR WITH THE CLEAN NAPTHA ODOR

The Picciola

By Virginia Macdonald Cummings

Illustrated by G. W. L. Bladen

It was afternoon in the little town of Ajax. The sky and the raggedy mountains were tight together, and the sun was edging between them like a copper in a slot. A stream of human beings, begrimed from head to foot except for each shining dinner-pail, poured over the railroad tracks and spread fan-like in all directions. The miners were coming off shift. Nothing very remarkable in that, save for the fact that it was April, Nineteen-Twenty-Two. With all the world of labor on strike who were the people of Ajax that they should pursue their coal-digging, quite as usual?

Some such sentiment was voiced by the stranger who sat beside Dr. Cartwright in the latter's car. Mrs. Cartwright with two small children occupied the rear.

"Do you see that burly Italian who just raised his hat to us?" It was the Doctor who spoke.

"The one with the snow-white hair? Yes?"

"That's Dominic Citra, President of the Local Union. He is the key to the whole situation."

"He must be a wizard if he can keep men working these days."

"Wizard is the correct term! Some say he hypnotizes them. And at that he used to be the worst man in the Pass to stir up trouble. A regular demon."

"But that was only after he lost his son in the Big Explosion," gently interpolated the Doctor's wife.

"Yes, that was enough to make anybody rabid. The boy was only fifteen, and it was his very first day in the mines. However, father and I almost went broke trying to run a contract hospital, with the men off work half the time. When the big strike in Winnipeg was called by the One Big Union, Ajax was the first place to declare a sympathy strike. Every worker even to the employees of the Water, Light and Power had to walk out. But Dominic at least, got enough of it that time. He is still adamant for the rights of his men, and usually gets a better bargain than most unions, for the operators know he is both firm and reasonable. But as for strikes—he says there will never be another while he can prevent it!"

"But what brought about such a change of heart?"

The Doctor and his wife exchanged long reminiscent smiles.

"Shall I tell him?"

"Go ahead if you want to, I don't care," said the latter. But her face grew pink as she sank back among the cushions.

So the facts the Doctor related were, briefly, what follows.

* * *

ONE evening in the spring of Nineteen-nineteen, the telephone rang so sharply in the Nurses' home that Ruth Kennedy gave a start and hurried to the receiver.

"Yes?"

"Oh yes, Doctor," Ruth flushed, and her voice broke a little.

"The Surgical nurse? I'll see."

That young lady was just climbing, with slightly accelerated movement, into a run-about.

"Oh Isabel! Dr. Jim wants you at the hospital."

"No doubt of that," laughed Isabel complacently, "But he'll not see me to-night."

"But Isabel I think it's emergency, and the old Doctor is out on a case."

"Some fat dago that you couldn't kill with the axe! He'll do just as well in the morning." Again that knowing soft laugh, and the arch look at her companion. That young man, convinced that the Doctor often resorted to these subterfuges, let his chest out and his gears in with such energy that the car was far down the road by the time Ruth got back to the phone.

"I'm sorry Doctor, but the Surgical Nurse is out this evening."

She could hear him sputter with vexation before he asked if she could help him.

"Of course," she said brightly, visioning "a fat dago that you couldn't kill with the axe."

He turned abruptly away. Quite as an afterthought, he looked back long enough to tell the fair-haired Welshman where he might spend the Hereafter.

Now was her opportunity! Her secret ambition was to work in the Surgery, but Dr. Jim thought there was nobody like Isabel. Isabel's assurance was so amazing that it communicated itself to everybody. If she made a mistake people got the subtle impression that, even at that, it was better than anyone else could have done. Ruth on the other hand was apt to be desolated with the thought of how far she was at all times from her ideal. But she would prove herself to-night! She must be very cold and efficient and above all betray no emotion!

By this time she had reached the hospital.

"I'm sorry Isabel couldn't come," she said demurely.

"So am I," returned the Doctor, grimly. "But it's about what I expected. Confound it! There's something in the air these days. Everybody trying to see how much work he can get out of! Look at this strike that's being pulled off in Winnipeg, I'm afraid it means more than people think. Dominic Citra is down there now, plucking a brand from the conflagration with which to inflame this town. I wish he knew his baby was dying of appendicitis."

Ruth glanced at the operating table and paled a little; for on it lay a frail little wisp of a child. Her face possessed the perfect Madonna-like beauty which sometimes startles one in the little street-children of the Italians. Only her eyes seemed too large, and the mop of dark curls too heavy for the delicate oval of her face.

"Dominic's child? I thought his only son was killed in the Explosion?"

"Yes, and after that the mother just lived on her knees in front of the Virgin, and the Cross. Night and day she knelt there—I've seen her many a time—looking up into the face of the beautiful Sistine Madonna and praying. When this child was born to them they thought it was the answer to that prayer. Her father idolizes her."

And the Doctor fell to scrubbing his hands still more viciously.

Ruth put the instruments in the sterilizer. Then she filled the empty ether cans with hot water and went to pack them in the bed that was to receive the little patient. In the hall the child's mother was wandering about, twisting the fringe of her head-shawl. Ruth led her gently into the ward.

"You sit here, dear," she said, giving her a chair. "Presently we will bring the picciola—your little one—in here and you can sit with her."

"Confound it!" exclaimed Dr. Cartwright, pawing at his rubber gloves. "I'm not a believer in premonitions, but I never hated so to go at an operation! Suppose it's because I'm so handicapped," he added with thoughtless cruelty.

"You couldn't leave it till morning?" suggested Ruth all too eagerly.

Impossible! It's a matter of minutes. The abscess is heading into the peritoneum. The Lord help her if it breaks before we can reach it."

Ruth picked up her pan of sterile forceps. Just then the shrill whistle of the west-bound train rent the air. The pan suddenly left her hands and the forceps fell to the ground in a tangled mass. They looked to Ruth like a swarm of big black spiders scuttling over the floor. She was sure some of them crawled away to the farthest corner of the room. She scooped up what she could of them and gave the rest a kick. Dr. Jim favored her with just one look but she felt it all through her like knives.

The last shreds of that whistle were still on the air and the wheels of the train had not crunched to a standstill, when from the lowest step dropped a burly figure with bushy hair and blazing eyes. It was Dominic, newly arrived from Winnipeg.

He walked straight over to the Power House. The men crowded round him. His voice, usually like a young steam-riveter, to-night was low and intense. Now and then the men would start back exclaiming at one another, only to close in the more closely on the speaker again. He showed them some oblong cards about five by eight inches in size. He told how one of these cards would shortly be displayed by every going concern in Winnipeg. If in Winnipeg, why not in Ajax?

The men laughed low and exultantly. They grasped him by the hand and slapped him on the back.

"Dominic, you're a wonder!" they said.

Dominic strode across the room and laid his hand on the wall.

The ether had been given and the Doctor had just made the long clean incision. A wicked gangrenous-yellow mass was already visible. In the Doctor's hand was a small electrical device the end of which glowed white hot. In a moment this point would touch first one end then the other of the appendix, severing and sterilizing in one. Then the whole deadly mass would be lifted out, and simultaneously Death would step from the path of the little picciola.

The Doctor's big frame bent over the wound. Suddenly—flick went the lights. The white point in his hand glowed red. He looked above his head at the ring of bluish bulbs. They were fading. All he could see were curly red filaments ranged in a big circle. Then those melted into utter blackness. He looked down at his hand. The glowing point had disappeared.

The two stood there tense, scarcely breathing, waiting for the lights to come on. Second after second they waited. At last something of the truth dawned on Dr. Jim and he swore!

"Quick! The lamps!" he cried.

Ruth snatched open the door, stumbling over a soft black object in the hall. It was the little Italian mother, crouched close in to the crack of the door. She had followed the nurse as far as she could and knelt there counting her beads.

She picked herself up.

"I go to find Dominic," she whimpered and groped her way out into the night.

Ruth ran on till she came to the closet where the lamps were kept. There they were in a neat row, far back on the top shelf—clean, polished, and devoid of any drop of paraffin!

As she turned she stumbled into Dr. Jim who was close behind. When he caught her up she was trembling.

"Dear God, don't let her slip away! Heavenly Father, help us to be in time!" The girl was not aware that the words were falling audibly from her lips.

"Are there candles?" asked the Doctor. "I—perhaps—I don't know." Then in an altered voice she added, "We must find them."

Suddenly she became calm. She moved as one in a trance, unaware of her surroundings. She never knew what spirit guided her, but she walked straight to where the candles were. In three minutes she had assembled every one in the house. And of all the drawers that contained no candles, she never opened one.

Back in the Surgery she worked like one possessed, laying out dressings, making the candles sit up in their tomato-cans and pop-bottles, sterilizing the old-fashioned instruments. For the clean white-hot point was out of the question now.

At last the little form was tucked into its warm bed, and still as marble it lay there, with its waxen hands. The Doctor and nurse watched on either side. They watched a long time. The single candle sputtered below the rim of its can, and long shadows sprang on the wall.

Ruth moved for something. "Well, little girl," Dr. Jim broke the silence; there was a queer look in his eyes, and he reached towards her with his hand. "You've probably kept this little thing weighted to the earth. But at that you'll never be much good in the Surgery, will you?"

Cut to the quick, the girl turned away, fumbled at the bureau, and was thankful for the dark.

Suddenly the outer door burst open and a mad scrambling of feet was heard in the hall. Dr. Jim stepped out to encounter a frantic and dishevelled Dominic "Is she die? Do she live? Mia picciola! My little one! Where is she?" He glanced wildly about the place.

The Doctor with his hands in his pockets just stood and looked at him.

"It's no thanks to you that she isn't in Heaven," he said at last, but not ungently.

Dominic crumpled down on the lowest step of the stairs, and his head lolled against the wall. His iron-gray hair, perhaps because it was ruffled, seemed almost white.

Dr. Jim paced the floor, his face knit with exasperation. Now and then he would come and stand over Dominic, opening and closing his lips as if to say something, then turning impatiently away.

The door opened again, almost extinguishing the fluttering taper on the newel post, and in stepped two men, well known to Dr. Cartwright. They were the remaining members of the Strike Committee.

The Picciola

"Good evening, Doc." The spokesman, a fair-haired Welshman, was in great good humor. "You will have found by this time what it means to do without some of our modern conveniences, such as the working man produces with his toil. Now we don't wish to inconvenience you long, so we propose to restore your supply of juice at once."

"You are most kind," murmured the Doctor with a glint in his eye.

"But first as a mere formality, and to save you further trouble, we would ask that you display this little sign on the front of your building."

Here he produced one of the cards and held it up. It bore the inscription:—

"THIS INSTITUTION IS OPERATING BY PERMISSION OF THE STRIKE COMMITTEE"

Dr. Jim looked at it and his mouth fell open. His face got red right down to his collar. He turned abruptly away. Quite as an afterthought he looked back long enough to tell the fair-haired Welshman where he might spend the Hereafter.

Then he swung around on his heel. As he did so he came face to face with Ruth. She looked up with a wan sweet smile and murmured something.

"Dominic," said the Doctor with quiet sternness, "It is possible that with care your child will live."

The men's faces whitened and their caps came off as if by magic. They turned, and with Dominic at their head, they tiptoed clumsily out.

Ruth and Dr. Jim looked at each other. Then they smiled—smiles that held a world of understanding. Then he reached out and gathered her to him.

"But I'm not the sort of girl you admire," she faltered, "I'll never make a Surgical Nurse."

"No! Thank Heaven for that!" said the young man fervently. "You'll make the finest little wife in the world." And in the lightest of breaths in her ear he added, "And mother!"

* * *

The last of the miners came straggling by, the young ones a little sullen and the old ones mostly bent.

"That is why as yet we have no strike in Ajax, but one wonders how long it will last," mused Dr. Cartwright.

"Come Jim dear," his wife spoke huskily, "We must be moving on, the children will get cold."

"Janet Maynard! Janet Maynard! Janet Maynard!", stormed Betty May. "That woman has the lot of you bewitched."

Active Interference

By M. E. Smith

Illustrated by Mary Essex

EVERYONE said that Mrs. Maynard would marry John, and agreed that it was rather a pity—because of Betty May. The fluctuating half-dozen of worthy matrons who haunt the most comfortable chairs on the club-house verandah had discussed the subject joyfully for the past six weeks, almost to the total exclusion of the servant problem and their own bodily ailments. A great many spiteful things were said about all concerned, and after what happened at the Masquerade dance that Saturday night they talked more than ever. Nobody knew just what actually occurred, and consequently they were all very disagreeable about it. In justice to my wife, who is an extraordinarily fine woman, I feel I must make a definite explanation.

Betty May and John had belonged to each other since they were small children. They were separated perforce during the school year, but met again joyously every summer at the Club, to swim and play and get into all sorts of mischief. They were both good-looking, young, good sports, and inevitably they fell in love with one another. At least John fell in love with Betty May. But she, being as wholesome as the dawn, didn't recognize her own symptoms and had refused him three times in succession since Christmas, beseeching him not to ruin their beautiful friendship. John gloomily told me that if she didn't admit she loved him soon he would go to the devil, or drown himself or—"Just a minute, old chap, coming!"—and he left me to play vigorous tennis with the artist chap, Roger Franklyn. Which shows how seriously John took his love affair, and was all as it should be.

Then came Janet Maynard to stay at the Club. Certainly a stunning and attractive woman; all of thirty, she admitted, but she barely looked twenty-five, even in the hot sun on the links, or in a bathing suit, (and she was a magnificent swimmer.) She was tall and gracious, grey-eyed, curious light grey eyes that were both soulful and sophisticated, with black hair and a creamy white skin. She spoke of her deceased husband briefly and respectfully on occasion, and still wore black and white and a pearly sort of grey colour because they were vastly becoming, and not as mourning. For two weeks the older men—including myself—hovered eagerly about her. Consequently I, for one, was horribly disappointed when she turned her big guns on John, who was five or six years her junior, and threatened to capture him without a struggle. She didn't seem the sort of woman that would marry even a nice boy like John for his money—though he certainly had quantities of it. And Betty May was furious and heart-broken, but wouldn't admit it. After about three weeks, during which John still played about with her while his interest was obviously elsewhere, she began to refuse his invitations and started an outrageous flirtation with Roger Franklyn, who had hovered about hopelessly in the offing for the past two summers.

As for myself, being old and wise and a bachelor, with a game leg and rapidly greying hair, (though the silly crisp curl that had been the bane of my boyhood still lingered), I had been more or less in the confidence of all concerned. The porch pussies never abate their gossip one whit when I am about, but clamour for my honest opinion on any subject that happens to be under discussion—at least they used to. Flappers and debutantes bring me their heart secrets and social problems; young men call me "Good old Major!" and ask my sound advice (though they never take it) about clothes, love affairs, horses and money. But now John rather avoided me, which is easily understood, and Betty May kept her grief to herself, though I could see it in her bewildered blue eyes when she looked at him. As for Janet Maynard, she smiled a little half smile, and went her own sweet way.

It was she who arranged the Masquerade dance. She said we were all sick of one another's clothes. The girls seized upon the idea with enthusiasm, and most of them made mysterious journeys to Montreal under various excuses to see about appropriate costumes. The men were a little cold about it, as men always are, whereupon Mrs. Maynard ordained we were to wear white flannels and coloured jackets or blazers where possible, and we were much relieved. She and Roger Franklyn spent that Saturday afternoon decorating the verandah and dancing pavilion, and must be given considerable credit for the effectiveness of their simple scheme—just dozens of Chinese lanterns, red and yellow and orange, hanging from the roof in uneven lines, and in the corners great jars filled with cardinal flowers and bull rushes. There was a luscious full moon that night, silvering the lake that lay at the foot of the hill—and Lake Memphramagog under a full moon is a sight to be remembered. So was Janet Maynard. She was gorgeous in a sort of Mandarin jacket all scarlet and blue and gold, with cardinal flowers in her black hair. It was the first time any of us had seen her wearing colours, and we were overwhelmed.

I arrived late and stood for quite a while at the entrance to the pavilion, smoking and watching the moving whirl of dancers under the soft lights. From the other end of the Pavilion the blare of the big gramophone came faintly over the sounds of shuffling feet and laughter. Betty May, adorable in a ruffy Mid-Victorian thing she told me had really been worn by her great-aunt, danced by with Roger Franklyn and waved at me. The silly ass wore a velvet jacket and a floppy tie—just the sort of thing he really likes to do. I saw John dancing with Mrs. Maynard, talking so intently that neither of them noticed me at all. Then I was seized by two impish girls and whirled into the idiotic jumble of a Paul Jones in spite of my protests and desperate excuses.

"This wounded hero stuff, Major!" said one, pulling me along with her, "I wouldn't believe it of you!" And so it was some time before I realized that Janet Maynard and John, quite the most striking couple on the floor, had disappeared. In fact it only came to me when I broke away somehow and met a wild-eyed Betty May coming into the pavilion. She seized me by the sleeve and drew me aside.

"Have you seen John lately, Major dear?"

"Why—no—I haven't."

"Or that Maynard woman?"

"Nor that Maynard woman."

"Roger says they've gone down the boat-house road. Major, you must stop him!"

"Stop who? Roger? I'll smear him all over the place with pleasure if he's bothering you."

"No—no! John! Don't let him propose to her."

"But my dear Betty May, how can I stop him proposing to any woman he wants to? And besides, my good child, how do you know he intends to propose?"

"I know she intends him to—that's what I know. Why all this masquerade stuff and everything? Doesn't she know she looks perfectly wonderful to-night? Didn't she know there would be a full moon? Haven't they gone down to the boat-house? Well?"

I felt decidedly uncomfortable. The boat-house is facetiously known as the "danger-spot," as many of the Club romances have crystallized there.

"Betty May," I adjured her solemnly, "if John is going to propose you have to let him. You can't interfere with these things. It's too dam' dangerous. You can plot and plan till you're blue in the face, and the result will be any one of a hundred unexpected calamities—and never what you hope. Take your old Major's word for it. I've seen too many romances spoiled by well-meaning interference. And besides, if he doesn't propose to-night, he has to-morrow—and to-morrow—and to-morrow!"

"To-morrow!" said Betty May scornfully. "To-morrow there won't be a full moon and Chinese lanterns and music. And she won't be wearing perfectly fascinating black satin trousers and flowers in her hair. And to-morrow I will be as nice as I can be, and try to win him back. I'll fight that woman till I'm dead."

"That's the stuff, Bets!" I said enthusiastically. "I'm betting on your own good sense, and your pretty face and your sweet self. Janet Maynard may be twice as clever and twice as experienced and three times as good-looking as you are, my dear—" she snorted at that, positively snorted—"But she's almost ten years older, and that makes a whale of a difference. So try to enjoy yourself to-night. To-morrow is time enough to fight."

"Yes,—if he doesn't get himself engaged to her to-night. Major, you must go right down to the boat-house and play gooseberry. You must!"

"I can't!" I exclaimed, horrified. "Betty May, do you know what you are asking? I'll make myself hated for life. John will never forgive me—and as for Janet Maynard—!"

"Janet Maynard! Janet Maynard! JANET MAYNARD!" stormed Betty May. "That woman has the lot of you bewitched. Major Blake, if you are a friend of mine, you'll start down that road this minute! What do you care about Janet Maynard when my heart is breaking?"

"But Betty May—"

"Please, Major!" There were tears in her eyes and her voice. I yielded.

"Very well, my dear. But pray for me. I'm your own true knight and all that, and this is a very dangerous adventure!" She laughed a little shakily, and pulled a foolish flower from her frock.

"Here's my token, Sir Knight!" she said, tucking it in my button-hole. So shaking my head and full of inward fears, I set off down the road.

* * *

THE boat-house is in a little bay, at the end of a road that curves through woods of maple and birch. There were white water lilies floating in the bay, and the moonlight hung heavily over everything. I found them sitting with their feet swinging above the lazy water, still talking earnestly.

"Hullo, people!" I greeted them inanely. "Tired of tripping the light fantastic? Hullo, John, why aren't you dancing?"

"Fed up with the crowd," said John briefly, looking none too pleased at the interruption. I felt that Betty May's worst fears were in a fair way to be realized.

"That's all very well for us staid old people, eh, Mrs. Maynard?" I said. (I hope she has since forgiven me for that!) "But youngsters should be having a good time. Run along now, John, and I'll smoke a peaceful cigarette with Mrs. Maynard." John glowered.

"I can't dance," he lied gloomily, "I have a blistered heel."

"Too bad," I said blandly. "Wonderful night, isn't it?" I foresaw that I must resign myself to a hideous hour or so till she grew desperate and made some sort of move. They both agreed fervently and hopefully, and then watched me settle myself against the rail in deadly silence.

SYNOPSIS OF PREVIOUS CHAPTERS

Lady Kilcroney (formerly known as the fascinating widow, Kitty Bellairs), secures an appointment as Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. This arouses the jealousy of Mrs. Lafone, who tries to injure Kitty, when a friend of the latter, Lady Mandeville, who had been guilty of a youthful folly, appears on the scene. Kitty's loyalty to her repentant friend triumphs, and Queen Charlotte greets her graciously. In the meantime, Lydia Pounce, Lady Kilcroney's own maid, is dismayed by the appearance of her niece, Pamela Pounce, upon the scene. Pamela has been dismissed from the milliner's shop of Madame Eglantine in Paris, because the latter's husband has tried to thrust unwelcome attentions upon her. Pamela enters the service of Mrs. Tabbishaw in London, and, in the course of her duties, comes upon young Jocelyn Bellairs, the nephew of Lady Kilcroney's first husband, who is about to commit suicide in the park. Pamela snatches the pistol, and, to save Jocelyn's honor, gives him the money which Lydia had handed to her to pay Lady Kilcroney's bill with Mrs. Tabbishaw. Kitty, who has been distracted about Jocelyn's threats, is delighted when she finds what Pamela has done and straightway takes her into favor.

Pamela thus obtains a position as head of the millinery in Madame Mirabel's establishment, but is persecuted by the dishonorable attentions of young Bellairs. She is about to elope with him from the Rose Inn when a tragedy in which Lord Sanquhar kills a poor Spaniard and steals the wife, who deserts her child, shocks Pamela and turns her on her Christmas journey home. Sir Jasper Standish, the landlord of the Pounce family, also shows himself a villain, but Pamela defies him. Then Lady Kilcroney tries to make a match between Sir Jasper and Lady Selina Vereker.

"Do not say you were not warned," said my Lady, and had the laugh of scorn to herself to see with what conquering airs Sir Jasper glanced at himself in each mirror when, departing, he crossed the long length of her drawing-room at Queen's Lodge.

The pretty Maid-of-Honour and the already foresworn widower duly met over Kitty's bohea, next afternoon. Sir Jasper duly fell head over heels in love; and before the week was out, they were engaged to be married. Royalty approved, my Lady Ongar gave her consent with tears of joy; and both Susan Verney and Ann Day sent cool sisterly sanction.

Having secured her victim Kitty prepared herself to enjoy every moment of the delightful process of decking her for the sacrifice. What woman but does not feel that in the trousseau lies the true inward satisfaction of the bridal state? To a benevolent heart like my Lady Kilcroney's the choice of Lady Selina's garments, the proper expenditure of the funds entrusted to her for the purpose by the widowed mother offered a task in which duty went hand in hand with delight. Generous soul that she was, she promptly decided to supplement the Dowager's exiguous allotment by a contribution of her own: secretly, so as not to hurt the poor child's feelings, but to an extent which should in her estimation befit the wedding of a maid-of-honour under the protection of the Lady Kilcroney.

Needless to add that to bring Selina to Pamela Pounce was almost the first of her desires as self-elected Fairy God-mother. Who but Pamela indeed, could set out a Bride so that her appearance on the great morning should be an event in the world of Fashion? Pamela under Kitty's instructions—there never was such a combination of intellect!

My Lady Kilcroney as she drove up through the bright sunshine from Windsor was filled with anticipations so agreeable and exciting that she had little thought to spare for the silence and irresponsiveness of the girl beside her.

Selina had a delicious little countenance, even though she was sulking heavily; so when her glance strayed reflectively upon her my Lady found nothing in the contemplation to disturb her equanimity.

It was the first time in its annals that the House of Mirabel beheld a carriage with the Royal liveries halt before its portals, and the flutter in its discreet walls was indescribable.

Madame Mirabel herself catching sight of the scarlet splendour, through the first floor window, was seized with the trembles, and had to send Miss Clara Smithson for a glass of ratafia out of the back parlour cupboard before she could control her limbs sufficiently to walk downstairs. It was true that her immense agitation was promptly allayed by Miss Polly Popple, who put her head in at the door to say:

"It's only my Lady Kilcroney after all, what's brought a pale Miss for a wedding hat. So don't you put yourself about, Madame Mirabel, and Miss Pounce that cool it don't look as if her opinions were what they ought to be, and gracious goodness where is the roll of silver ribbon came from Lyons? I laid it out of my hand, Clara, when I ran up a while ago about Mrs. Lafone's bill, and him giving all sorts in the show-room. I wouldn't be married to an elderly gentleman what's miserly not for—where's the silver ribbon for mercy's sake? There's the bell going after me like mad. Thank you, dear. Don't put yourself about, Madame Mirabel—who ever told you it was the Queen! It's only my Lady Kilcroney—drat it, there it goes again—I'm coming."

Pamela Pounce had caught a glimpse of Kitty's dainty profile behind the misleading scarlet as the Queen's barouche halted; and it was with her usual graceful self-composure that she swam forward to curtsy to her patroness. Four steps and a nicely graduated obeisance, with just an undulation which included my Lady's companion, Pamela had a perfect command of the correct attitude. Then she waved her hand.

"Chairs, Miss Popple. Pray be seated, ladies."

Then, with a pretty spring of alacrity in manner and voice, a most respectful yet delightfully confidential approach to familiarity:

"And what can I show your Ladyship to-day?" cried she. "There's the sweetest head, a twist of cherry tulle with a bunch of green grapes, just come from Paris—made for your Ladyship."

Kitty waved the tempting suggestion on one side. "Nothing for me to-day, my dear creature. I've brought Lady Selina."

Selina, who had entered, stood and sat down like an automaton with every reason to be dissatisfied with its surroundings, here gave her patroness a steely look of enmity, and then cast down her eyes so that their long eye-lashes cast a shadow on her white cheek.

Pamela appraised the small set face and Kitty proceeded to expound; "The fact is, Miss Pounce, I am here with Lady Selina for a wedding order."

"Indeed, my Lady."

"Yes, indeed," cried Kitty, warming to her subject, "the wedding hat, no less, child, and the going away! Oh! And a head for the dinner party I mean to give in honour of the engagement. Princess Augusta has promised to attend. And the wedding is to take place from my house in Hertford Street, Pamela, the very moment May is over. What with my Lady Verney having a feeling about the mourning and my Lady Anne Day so set about with measles in her nursery, there isn't anyone as near to this dear girl as myself, if it's reckoned by old friendship."

Here Kitty paused for breath and after duly waiting for Lady Selina to express some acknowledgments of these handsome sentiments, Pamela, in the young person's persistent mutism, was fain to remark that there was no one like her Ladyship for kindness, that she knew. And though this was but a deferential murmur, there was conviction in it. Pamela had every reason for this testimony.

Kitty glanced askance at the bride's most unbride-like countenance; she faintly shrugged her shoulders. None of the Verekers had good tempers and she was not going even to notice Selina's moods.

"A wedding hat."

Pamela pondered upon the bride, while her quick brains worked.

"(Dear to be sure, the poor young lady! One would think 'twas her funeral things they were getting together. Who are they going to marry her to? And why is my Lady Kilcroney managing it all, and that mortal tickled?) I wouldn't recommend white satin for my Lady Selina," she said out loud, "though I know it's the usual thing, my Lady. And if I might venture, it wouldn't do to be putting dead white next her face. No, my Lady Kilcroney, no, my Lady Selina, not if you was to rouge ever so and that would be a thousand pities; my Lady's skin is a treat to look at. And it's her cachet to be pale with those dark eyes—excuse me, my Lady, for dropping into French, it's a way I got into in Paris. Now I'd like lace." The milliner spoke slowly as if she were tasting one by one, the condiments of an exquisite dish. "A fine brim of real lace, my lady, with a tulle lining, three layers of tulle, and the middle one pale pink. Oh, pale, pale, pale." Pamela twiddled her fingers in the air, mitigating the colour till it faded into nothingness. "The tint they're calling in Paris, cuisse de nymphe émue. Excuse me, my Lady, I won't be so bold as to translate it. Yes, your Ladyship, the French have droll minds! But your Ladyship has seized the idea; not pink, but just a warmth, a lightening of the white, 'twill be exquisite. A twist of silver ribbon to hold it together—Miss Popple, where's that silver ribbon that came from Lyons? I have a model here," went on Pamela, stooping to pull out one of the deep drawers of the cupboard which ran the length of the room, and in which the most special treasures in the millinery line were hidden away from the ordinary public, only to be brought out for the favoured. "I have a model here which is the very latest, out of Paris. It'll never be seen at all, so to speak, till next month, and that on a Queen's head."

Queen Charlotte's Lady-in-waiting sprang up and tripped across the carpet to stand by the milliner's side.

"It must be worth while for a female of Fashion," my Lady was thinking, "to have a post about Queen Marie Antoinette, always the first in the land in modes and in looks as in everything else."

Now Lady Selina Vereker, hearing the two women whisper as they stood together, lifted her eyes and watched and hearkened very intently.

"The young lady's just engaged I take it," said Pamela, shaking the tissue paper from a cobweb vision of blue tulle and lace.

"Was only ratified by Lady Ongar last night, from her retreat at Wimbledon. (They say it's a convent of nuns my dear, but 'tis not generally known.)"

"Dear, to be sure, the poor lady!"

Here Kitty lowered her voice, but Selina's irately keen ears caught the murmur.

"Sadly ill-provided for. My Lord Ongar's affairs in a desperate state. Hardly a brass farthing between the three poor girls! A most prodigious relief to have the third settled."

Then Pamela's clear compassionate undertone.

"I trust the young lady is happy in her choice, so young she looks."

The milliner's eye wandered to the Bride-elect and met her darkling gaze.

"Why, that goes without saying," exclaimed my Lady tartly, "since I made the match, Miss Pounce. Sir Jasper Standish is one of my Lord's oldest friends."

"Sir Jasper Standish! Good God!" Pamela started and wheeled round. She echoed the words in accents which left no doubt as to the consternation evoked by the name.

Her face was reflected in the glass in front of her, and Selina had a vision of its blasted expression of horror and disapproval.

The next moment Miss Pounce had resumed her usual bland self control, and was bending over the French hat, feigning to be absorbed in twitching its knotted ribbons into place.

"Upon my word, Miss Pounce," exclaimed Kitty, in high surprise and anger. "And what have you got against Sir Jasper Standish, may I ask, that you should couple his name with such impiety?"

"Oh, nothing, my Lady, nothing!"

Pamela's hands trembled as she twitched the faint pink ribbons. "Nothing but a bit of a business trouble between my father and Sir Jasper, our place being all but next door to Standish Hall—I crave your Ladyship's pardon. I'm sure, for letting my feelings go away with me,—but Sir Jasper was hard on father over a mortgage."

"Oh! a mortgage! Pish, child!" Kitty was immensely relieved, though she could not conceal that she considered it a great liberty in a milliner thus to obtrude her family affairs upon the notice of distinguished clients. She had not so very high an opinion of Jasper herself, and Pamela was a prodigious handsome girl! She had been actually trembling over what might have come out!

My Lady's manner for the rest of the séance comically varied between a dignified displeasure and the overwhelming fascination exercised by the milliner's supreme talent.

Lady Selina submitted to all the trying-on and listened to the prolonged discussions with the same demeanour of angry martyrdom which she had brought into the shop.

"You're been insufferable, my dear!" cried Kitty, patience giving way at length, as the sleek royal horses started on their homeward way.

Selina turned her long, brilliant eyes upon her companion without speaking. There was a pert question and an underlying significance in them, which further exasperated the chaperone.

"Pon honour!" exploded Kitty, "I marvel what's to do with you. You, with everything the world can give you, and three as sweet hats chosen as ever I've seen in my whole life! Such a picture as you'll look, a Bride, with your mother's lace and all! and by the airs of you, you might have been trying on sack cloth to go to the stake."

"You must remember, my Lady Kilcroyne, that I am in mourning."

"Psha!"

"And Sir Jasper a widower himself."

"And what of that, child?"

"Oh, nothing," said Selina. "Do you think it's going to rain?"

Kitty looked at her long and earnestly. Was there ever such a little shut-up countenance, such obstinate close lips and such naughty secret eyes?

"I wish to Heaven," she said, at last, "that you'd say what you've got in your heart, child."

"Oh, I was just thinking about Miss Pamela Pounce!"

"And what of her?"

My Lady still uneasily remained cross.

"Oh, I only thought she looked honest!" said the girl. And not one other word to the purpose could my Lady Kilcroyne extract from her.

They drove into Windsor in a strained silence and separated to their divers duties in no very cordial mood.

Kind-hearted people in positions of authority are apt to fall into the danger of doing good to their neighbours in spite of themselves. They see so clearly the value of the benefits they mean to confer, that fate having given them the power to enforce their acceptance, they do not hesitate to wield it. With the best intentions in the world they become tyrants. Kitty had a real desire to be of use to the orphan, and she was quite sure that the plans she had laid for her were entirely for her comfort and well-being. In any case matters had gone too far for Selina, even to dream of such a catastrophe as a withdrawal of her word.

The Maid-of-Honour had accepted Sir Jasper of her own free will. If she had secretly repented, if she chose to sulk and make a martyr of herself, Kitty knew better than to encourage her by seeming to notice it. And my Lady told herself that the moods of such a chit were of no account. She was too fresh out of the schoolroom to stand so much promotion all together—Maid-of-Honour, Bride-elect, the pet of royalty, all in a couple of months—a little spoilt cat, and if she scratched Jasper 'twould but do him a vast of good.

Nevertheless, my lady Kilcroyne felt slightly uncomfortable until she next beheld the engaged couple together. Then, indeed—it was the next evening after their shopping drive to London, in my Lady's own rooms—Selina appeared to have completely forgotten her gloomy fit. The child was in outrageous spirits, with quite scarlet cheeks, taunting and mocking her ardent lover, till he was beside himself.

Kitty forbore rebuke. In her relief she was full of indulgence towards behaviour which, at another time, she would have severely reprobated.

"My dear love," she wrote to her husband that night. She was still in attendance at Windsor and Denis, very much injured, was alone at Hertford Street. "Everything is going as well as possible. Do not forget to call on Mr. Gunter's about the wedding cake and on Mr. Bartolozzi about the tickets of invitation."

Could she have known how Lady Selina had employed the afternoon of that very day, the poor Lady-in-Waiting would have issued very different instructions.

For Selina had obtained leave from her "Royal" to go to town about her trousseau. The Princess Augusta, all blandness and good nature, offered every facility, even to her own carriage.

How grateful was Lady Selina! But "Oh, no, Ma'am," she pleaded, "it makes bitten my tongue out. I can only ask your pardon."

"I want you to answer my question. What did you mean?"

Pamela, who had been growing pale, grew paler.

"Father had trouble with him over a mortgage."

"Oh, tush with your mortgage! That's only a bit of trumpery. It wasn't the mortgage. You know something of Sir Jasper."

The milliner hesitated: then she tossed her head.

"And if I do, my Lady? There! There ain't anything for you to suspect me about, I do assure you."

His distress was so genuine, his supplications were so heart-rending that Kitty Kilcroyne could not but let herself be mollified.

me feel so horrid shy! There we were yesterday, my Lady Kilcroyne and I, in one of the Queen's barouches and every one turning round and staring at us, and oh! so disappointed, Ma'am, not to see the Royal faces. My mother is sending her own maid for me, and we'll take a chaise and Sister Verney will meet me in the town."

Princess Augusta looked very kindly at the child. She liked her modest disclaimer and the little flattery it wrapped about, and it all sounded very proper and becoming. How could she guess that Selina was lying like a little devil, that the audacious creature would positively set out from the consecrated precincts of Queen's Lodge alone, take the common coach to town and proceed on foot to Bond Street; in a kind of disguise indeed, a plain bonnet, borrowed off a Royal housemaid, which had a brown gauze veil to drop over her face, so that she might have passed her own mother in the street and not been known!

The cunning girl watched her opportunity and slipped into Miss Pounce's show-room at a slack moment. As she flung back her veil Pamela's colour changed; she saw who it was.

Selina walked quite close up to her and the two stood a moment staring at each other. The milliner was too acute not to feel the moment big with importance, and too shrewd not to guess at the cause.

"What did you mean," said Selina then, "by saying yesterday like that: 'Sir Jasper! good God!'"

Pamela was not often taken-to, but she felt herself in a most disagreeable fix.

"La!" she faltered. "I could have

"Oh, I don't suspect you!" cried Selina wildly. "I see you hate him! I hate him myself! I haven't anyone to help me. What do you know of him?"

"Nothing that would count as against a gentleman's honour," said Pamela bitterly recalling, with an inward shudder, the vile trick that had been played upon her, and the narrowness of her escape.

Selina caught the working-woman's two capable hands

"I won't get you into a scandal! I know you've got your bread to earn. I'll never mention your name or let anyone guess! I promise! I promise! Look here, I'll put it differently: if you were me, would you marry Sir Jasper Standish?"

Pamela drew a long breath and the truth leaped.

"I'd see myself dead rather!"

The absurdity of the phrase did not detract from its effectiveness.

"Ah!" cried Selina. "Thank you! That's all I wanted to know."

She wrung the hands she had caught, whisked her veil over her flushed countenance and turned to leave. On the threshold of the shop she paused and flung back a quick reassurance.

"Don't be afraid. I'll never betray you!" which Miss Polly Popple, overhearing, promptly carried to the awestruck ears of Miss Clara Smithson.

"There's a low-class girl just been in the showroom blackmailing Miss Pounce and gone off Heaving knows with how much hushmoney! 'I won't betray you,' says she. And Miss Pounce looking after her, that distraught, you'd think she'd seen a ghost."

"Ah! my dear," said Miss Smithson. "Retribution is gathering over that abandoned creature's head."

CHAPTER VII

IN WHICH IS MANIFEST THE HAND OF THE SAINTED JULIA

OH, my Lady Kilcroyne, I haven't a moment! The most dreadful thing has happened!"

Selina Vereker stood before the astonished Kitty. She was robed for Court ceremonial and looked a very splendid young woman in brocaded whites and silver laces. Her hair was full dressed and spread mightily in wings and curls. In her hand she held a posy of pink roses. But against all this elegance, the small countenance looked troubled; it was, indeed, contorted like that of a child about to cry.

"I haven't a moment," she repeated. "The Princess Augusta expects me to attend her to the Duchess of Hampshire's ball, and even now she will be waiting for me. But oh, my Lady, oh, my Lady, I thought I must run in to tell you—Sir Jasper has broken with me!"

"Never say so, child! And the marriage for next Monday as ever was!"

My Lady Kilcroyne was in the long, narrow parlour which formed part of her set of rooms in St. James's Palace. She, too, was in full fig; a marvel of glistening white, with the fashionable purple trimmings that proclaimed attachment to Royalty. The Bellairs diamonds shone at her throat and bodice, and diamonds shot from every angle of her piled and flying curls. At the Maid-of-Honour's words she shook and sparkled and quivered in all her finery, looking like some magic tropical bird spreading out wings for battle.

"The Princess Augusta is waiting for me!" cried Selina, and sobbed.

"Let her wait," quoth Kitty fiercely. She had enough familiarity with the Royals now to appreciate the fact that, after all, they were but human beings. "What has happened? Sit there and tell me this moment. Sir Jasper break off his engagement! Some fantastick of jealousy, sure. The man's mad! Why, 'tis but this morning you showed me that wonderful knot of brilliants he gave you, child, on your complaining you had no fancy for a dead woman's jewels."

Selina let herself fall into the chair indicated, and hid her face in her hands.

"Oh, the disgrace!" she moaned.

"It shall not be," stormed her patroness. "You've dropped your roses, child."

"What, the roses? How—did I still hold them? Oh, my Lady, the roses, 'tis they undid me!"

"Your roses undid you? Talk plain, in the name of common sense."

"The roses undid me, Madam," said Lady Selina, lifting up her head to grind her teeth at Kitty, as that lady said afterwards, for all the world like her little Denis at ten months old with the double ones coming. "How should I know that when the beautiful pink roses arrived they were not from Sir Jasper? and oh, my Lady, he came storming into my parlour, demanding to see me, and I scarce out of the hands of Monsieur Achille and going in to him in my wrapper, I do assure you, not knowing what prodigious important thing he had to say to me, and he, my Lady Kilcroyne, scarce able to speak with the fierce rage. 'The roses,' he says, 'where are the roses you was to wear to-night?' And there they were, unpacked at his elbow before I had had time as much as to take them in my hand. As I'm a living woman, as I hope to be saved, my Lady, I, all innocence!" "The roses?" says I, and he falls upon them, and, oh, to think of it, in the very middle rose, hidden like a snake in the grass was a billet. A billet, my Lady Kilcroyne, I scarce know how to tell you—from—"

"Another gentleman?" screamed Kitty, jumping to the horrid truth.

"Some stranger."

"And indeed I hope so, Miss. And what was wrote in it, pray?"

Selina dropped long white eyelids over those brilliant curious eyes of hers which never seemed to corroborate her lips, and, drawing an immense quivering sigh, the corners of the same pretty lips going down over a sob: "Oh, my Lady, the monstrous audacity of it!" she cried. "The creature wrote—God knows who he can be—"

"If you wear these roses to-night, Beauteous Selina, your adorer will know that, whatever happens, he may still hope."

"Pon my word," said Kitty.

"It seems Sir Jasper had had an anonymous letter—"

"Ha," interrupted the Queen's Lady-in-Waiting. "Now lift up your head, my love. 'Tis all a vile plot. An anonymous letter, say you? Why, now all is plain. 'Tis some base, envious creature—Heaven knows who!" said Kitty. "Some old flame, some wretch who wants to break the marriage for abominable designs of her own. Psha! Was there ever a grosser scheme? 'Twould not take in a mouse!"

"Sir Jasper will not listen to a word of reason," complained the bride-elect, now unveiling the fury of her eyes. "He declares there was guilt on my face; that he had long had suspicions of me. He vows I have been cold to him, dearest Lady Kilcroney, and that matters must have gone very far between me and my lover—oh, is it not monstrous of him?—before anyone would have dared address me in such familiar words."

"You need not repeat his raving to me," cried my Lady Kilcroney decidedly. "Dry your eyes now, and hasten to your duty. Sir Jasper in his present mood may very well not come to the ball, but he shall render an account of his folly in this very room to-morrow morning, and if the marriage does not take place from my house next Monday as arranged, I am a Dutchwoman, as complete a Dutchwoman as Mrs. Schwellenberg. I can say no more. And I trust, said Kitty, soliloquising as the door slammed on the Maid-of-Honour's exit, "and I trust you will pay Sir Jasper back for this evening's work in good ringing coin, child, once you're Lady Selina Standish. As I have no doubt you will, my love—cold-hearted, capricious"—aye, he's not so far out there—and fiery tempered to boot! It will give me a vast of pleasure to see such a buck as he proper punished and tamed!"

She herself began the process with considerable conscientiousness next morning in that interview which Sir Jasper was ready enough to grant. My Lady was tired; for to be in attendance on Royalty was to make of a ball more of a fatigue than a diversion. She was anxious, too; for the Queen had heard that it was Lady Selina's visit to Lady Kilcroney which had resulted in the Princess Augusta actually being kept waiting; and had shown displeasure at so extraordinary a breach of etiquette.

Kitty had no explanation to offer. She would have died rather than hint at the threatening scandal. So considerable peevishness had accumulated to fall upon the devoted head of Sir Jasper.

But at first that individual was beyond feeling anything save his own anguish. He roared like a wounded bull; hit his brow till the powder flew; thumped his chest till his vocal chords reverberated; paced the room, declaiming in one breath that he was infamously betrayed, and in the next that 'twas a just retribution for perjury to the best of wives. He swore that his heart was broken; never had he loved, never could he love woman as he loved the false, intriguing Selina. Then he declared that the organ in question had never been mended but lay in fragments under the tombstone sacred to Julia.

It was only when his passion had expended itself in exhaustion that my Lady was able to make herself heard. Then she dissected the value of the evidence upon which he proposed to take so outrageous a step. She exposed the folly of his jealousy, she mocked the absurdity of the figure he cut.

"You have now," she said, "lost the finest young lady in the kingdom. You were about to contract a marriage altogether beyond what a man of your position and birth could hope for. You, a middle-aged widower, of no particular title—what's a baronet?—of no such remarkable fortune, with certainly no good looks to commend you—you were about to espouse the loveliest little creature in all the world, the Queen's favourite, scarce eighteen—a beauty, sir, of the first family! And on some kind of monstrous whimsy, arising from your own bad past—oh, of that I am quite certain, Sir Jasper—you have cast away this flower, and you have cast away with it your good name, your good fame, your own claim to be a gentleman! Never will that cake be eaten for your wedding with Lady Selina Vereker, I can promise you that! Oh, she's out of conceit with you, poor child! 'Only one thing I beg of you!' she says to me. 'Do not ask me to look at him again, for I never, never can!' Then you shall not," says I. I uphold her, sir, in her determination. 'You've come out of this business with flying colours, my love,' I says, 'and the Queen shall hear the whole story.' Fie, Sir Jasper, how you bellow! I have one last word to speak to you sir, aye, indeed, the very last you shall ever hear from these lips, and that is that I scarce think there's a gentleman of your friends, when it gets about the clubs, who would deem it worth his honour to cross swords with such as you."

She made a great flounce of silk skirts as if to withdraw, but he was down on his knees clutching at them; to do him justice, less affected by her threats and the picture she had drawn of his awful position than by the realisation that he had lost his bride. Never had Lady Selina appeared to his eyes in a light so entrancing; never did he so clearly perceive the worthlessness of his existence without her, as in this moment, when he believed he had lost her. His distress was so genuine, his supplications were so heartrending, that Kitty Kilcroney could not but let herself be mollified. She exacted every possible pledge of future good conduct, she obtained the completest retraction, the most abject and repeated apologies before sending for Selina.

When this young lady appeared Sir Jasper was put to another half-hour of torture ere he was re-admitted to favour; and even then the bride remained cold and unresponsive, and looked with a hard glitter in her eyes from one to the other, as if she had by no means forgiven her betrothed, and was scarce grateful to my Lady Kilcroney for her share in the reconciliation.

She had that moment, she informed him, sent the parcel containing Sir Jasper's presents, including the betrothal ring, by a trusted hand to his house; she vowed she considered matters vastly well as they stood; both would yet repent a return to the old terms.

Sir Jasper did not kneel to Selina. He behaved, Kitty thought, with a better dignity than she could have expected and also more intelligence. He promised perfect confidence in the future and a rope of pearls; the most tender forbearance in all difficulties and emerald earrings; the unswerving devotion of a manly heart and six Catalonian horses to the finest coach woman ever drove in. He furthermore volunteered to double his wife's pin-money, and altogether, as Lady Kilcroney informed her Denis afterwards, made a more graceful leg out of the business than could have been imagined from the gross fashion in which he had cantered in.

Lady Selina at length allowed an inert hand to lie in his clasp, and even permitted him to touch an averted cheek in token of her pardon; and it was an extremely chastened buck that wended his way out of St. James's Palace in the direction of Bond Street, and it was a tremendous sigh of relief that my Lady Kilcroney heaved.

"Now child," quoth she, "as Mr. Shakespeare hath it, 'All's well that ends well.' But do not make the mistake of keeping up your frigid airs too long. The real way to treat the wretches is to grant a little from time to time, and demand a great deal."

"I'm much obliged to you, I'm sure, ma'am, for your kind interest," said Lady Selina, and dropped her white eyelids over her audacious cold eyes.

"There has been another elopement," wrote Miss Burney, the Queen's reader, to her sister, "and you would never believe, my dearest Susan, who and in what circumstances. Lady Selina Vereker was, you know, to wed Sir Joseph Standish, that handsome widower (scarce indeed a year widowed of his poor Julia; men are strange things! I met her once, she was a very elegant woman). Lady Selina was, as I say, dear Susan, to wed Sir Jasper this actual next Monday, and my Lady Kilcroney who, as you know, hath the kind of good-nature that is for ever interfering in other people's affairs, was to give the breakfast at her own mansion in Hertford Street. 'Twas said she made the match. 'Tis quite certain she recommended the young lady at Court. She must be vastly sorry on both these accounts now. Princess Augusta was to go to the wedding (the bride being her own Maid-of-Honour); and altogether it is an odd, unpleasant business, as you will hear. Last night, then, Lady Selina attended the Royals to the Opera House. 'Twas to be her last duty of the kind, and she was ablaze, my dear, they tell me, with Sir Jasper's jewels. The poor man was infuriated. I cannot but pity him. She stood behind the Princess Augusta in the box as usual, and no one knows the exact moment of her disappearance. 'Tis positive she was present at the beginning of the third act. Then all attention was turned to the stage, and at the end of it she was nowhere to be found! Conceive it, my dearest Susan, to choose such a manner and such company, for such a proceeding! To me it is beyond imagination; but from the letter she left behind her, there can be, alas! no mistake. The young gentleman for whom she has shown her preference in so singular a fashion, is, it seems, a person of no note at all; a mere officer of the Marines, by name Simpson, with scarce any fortune beside his pay. The whole affair leaves one in a state of amaze, and I verily believe the world is going mad."

On the morning following the fatal evening just described, my Lady Kilcroney was awakened from very agreeable slumbers by the urgency of Miss Lydia Pounce, who, placing a letter on the bed, begged in a tone so important that her ladyship should wake up and read it at once, that Kitty, omitting to scold, forthwith proceeded to obey.

"Lady Selina's woman also brought a large case, my Lady. I've left it in the ante-chamber."

Kitty was in Hertford Street, making ready in sweet security for the wedding festivities; yet not so secure but that her heart misgave her from the first moment of the matutinal summons; it hardly needed the mention of Lady Selina's name to confirm her instant suspicions. Yet she was ill-prepared, as she herself averred to all and sundry later, for such a revelation of mixed baseness, ingratitude and idiocy.

"You have taken so kind an interest in my affairs, my dear Lady Kilcroney," wrote the Maid-of-Honour, "that I wish you to be the first to hear that by the time this reaches you I shall have become the wife of Lieutenant Simpson of the Royal Marines. 'Tis no sort of match for me, I am well aware, but I prefer him so infinitely to Sir Jasper Standish that, seeing no other way out of it, I have yielded to his solicitations. You may perhaps remember that when we were with Their Majesties at Brighton last month, there was a young man who used to stand on the Parade and stare as we went by. That was Mr. Simpson. From the moment I had accepted Sir Jasper—and indeed, it was scarce fair to put such pressure on me, and me so young—I knew I had made a great mistake. And oh, Heaven knows, how I tried to induce him to break it off! When I had succeeded at last—for 'twas I who wrote the anonymous letter about the roses, and 'twas I placed the billet-doux inside the rose (I still think 'twas a very ingenious trick), if it had not been for you all would have gone well. No one would have blamed me, as you told Sir Jasper yourself, but you would interfere, my Lady, and you brought it on again. And now, if you please, will you explain matters to Sir Jasper? I am sending the jewels to you that you may give them back. And oh, I am so glad to be free of him, and of them, and of Court I can't tell you! Oh, pray do not try your hand at match-making again, my Lady, for indeed you have no talent for it."

"Your obedient servant,

"Selina Soon-to-be-Simpson."

"I am sorry to treat my fat good-natured Royal so. She was a kind piece. But 'tis a vile life."

"And oh, oh, 'tis she is a vile piece! Simpson! Let her be Simpson to the end and die an old woman!"

Kitty was more outraged, more incensed, more profoundly disturbed than she had ever known herself. Why, indeed, had she meddled with match-making, and who would be looked on coldly over such scandal at Court, but she? all innocence, kind heart and good nature! She had half a mind to send in her resignation and have done with it.

As for Sir Jasper; he was well served, for an odious, bullying, stupid fellow, who couldn't make himself agreeable when he had the chance of his life. She put herself out any more for him? She expose herself to the unpleasantness of breaking the news to him? Not Kitty, not my Lady Kilcroney.

The little woman made up her mind in a minute. She would go out of town. It was fine April weather. Bath would be at its best. She preferred it out of season.

She would pass on the jilt's letter to Sir Jasper. Lydia should call a hackney coach and go round with it and the jewels at once.

"And I shall add a line," thought Kitty, "that will prevent him coming to seek sympathy from me!"

"When you have perused the letter of Lady Selina, by this time Simpson, dear Sir Jasper," she wrote, "perhaps you will feel as I do, that what has plucked you apart has not been either your indecorous behaviour or the young lady's capriciousness, but the hand of your sainted Julia."

It was fortunate that there was no one in the room to hear the awful words that escaped Sir Jasper's lips when he came to this. What fell from them was the blasphemy: "Damn Julia!"

CHAPTER VIII

IN WHICH A WONDERFUL BIT OF LUCK COMES OUT OF MISS POUNCE'S BANDBOX FOR SOMEBODY ELSE

MISS Pamela Pounce, having inadvertently married a most desirable alliance and incidentally assisted a mad elopement, told herself that it was a sad, tiresome world in which love brought trouble to high and low, and that the best thing a woman of intelligence could do, was to put such stuff out of her head and be grateful that she could work.

"Dear, to be sure," Pamela wondered, "how did people get along at all who hadn't some honest occupation to keep their silly minds off themselves?"

'Twas only to be expected that she should have such fretful faces to suit with heads and hats; disappointed mothers coming to complain that Miss's toque was the wrong shade of blue, passionate damsels vowing that the very sight of a pink rosette made them sick.

Pamela could read "as if it was wrote in print," as she said herself, the fluctuations of many an amourette, many a well-laid matrimonial scheme. Where her art might help she was ready with the most obliging disinterestedness; when failure had followed on her best efforts she took the despite of her disappointed clients with the utmost philosophy.

It was well that she was philosophic, for her own poor misplaced romance was going singularly ill; so ill, indeed, that it might be said to have dwindled down to nothing at all.

After his tender and respectful farewell to her on the night of Sir Jasper Standish's Christmas ball, Pamela had hardly seen anything more of her once too ardent admirer. She told herself that 'twas all as it should be; he now understood the kind of girl she was; and his present attitude showed more true affection for her than his former light-minded persecution.

If she had been born his equal, or if she had not been, humble as she was, a creature of principle, what could have parted them? for if ever there had been love—

Pamela was very valiant, and kept her courage up with such reflections. And she found considerable distraction in her work, and quite a fund of consolation in the increased success which it was bringing to her. But when events enabled her to coax a bit of happiness to some-one else, through the witchery of her talents, it was more real satisfaction to her than the tot of the weekly accounts

"Hats for these young ladies, Madam? Yes, Madam."

"A hat for this young lady," said Lady Amelia Vibart, severely.

She looked disapprovingly at Miss Pamela Pounce. She disapproved on principle of anyone whom she considered her inferior, and when a person belonging to the working classes was presuming enough, not only to have good looks, but to make the most of them, Lady Amelia considered it a direct attack on the prerogatives of those destined by Providence to hold a higher station. Only that she had been recommended to Madame Mirabel's shop as the one place positively, in the whole town, where any self-respecting woman of fashion could get herself a hat to be called a mode, she would have walked out of the show-room at the mere sight of this creature, so tall and self-possessed, so white and ruddy, clothed in garments that fitted an indecently fine figure to positively scandalous nicety, a creature who moved as if she were the condescending party, and carried taper hands each side of her waist-ribbon, not exactly akimbo, but with an air—yes, in very truth, an air of independence.

Miss Pounce looked at her visitors reflectively; a high nosed haughty, short, stout lady, flanked on either side by two tall daughters, the one beautiful, astoundingly so, a perfect miracle of loveliness; and the other—plain. No doubt about that; pleasant, bright-eyed, witty-looking, but plain.

"A hat for Miss?" said the milliner, her glance resting upon the less favoured but unmistakably the elder damsel.

The high-nosed lady tossed her head.

"Certainly not," she said with a glare. Here she pushed the beauty forward, "For this young lady."

She looked round for a chair, let herself subside on a velvet stool, obsequiously advanced by Polly Popple, and began to talk very volubly and pompously.

"I have been told that you have very good taste. What can you suggest for my daughter? Perhaps I had better tell you I am Lady Amelia Vibart. The Duchess of Queensberry has recommended you. I am sure that I shall find that you deserve her kind recommendation. I trust that you will. It is not my custom to come to shops myself, I generally expect to be served in my own house, but the Duchess advised me—this is Miss Jane Vibart. I think you must have heard of Miss Jane Vibart."

She paused, inflating her nostrils and fixing an ox-like stare upon the young woman, who really seemed quite independent.

Pamela turned her attentive gaze upon Miss Jane Vibart. It was perfectly true that she had heard of her, for there was a great deal of talk in the particular distinguished circle that patronised Madame Mirabel on the subject of the beautiful Miss Vibart. Something superlative, overwhelming, an absolute miracle, she was proclaimed to be; but the head milliner preferred something with a little more life and mind in it, herself. She betrayed by no sign that she recognised the overwhelming favour and opportunity that was here bestowed upon her, but inclined her head sideways, after the most elegant millinery convention, and said: "Indeed, Madam? Certainly, my Lady," as if these were any ordinary new customers.

Lady Amelia snorted, took an immense breath, and burst into fresh volubility with, if possible, an increased pompousness.

"It is of high importance, you understand, that Miss Jane Vibart should be suited in the finest taste, I must request you to give your earnest attention to the matter. Stand forward, Jane, have I not already told you to stand forward? And you, sit down, Sarah. You're in everybody's way. Now, young woman, what do you suggest? I want something of distinction; girlish, you understand, but absolutely elegant. Everyone will be looking to see what Miss Jane Vibart is wearing. 'Tis Miss Jane Vibart's first appearance upon the Windsor Walk. I think it will be very good business for you if you suit her. It will bring you a great many orders. I trust you will consider that, young woman, and represent it to your employer."

"Excuse me, your Ladyship," said Miss Pounce, when Lady Amelia stopped for want of breath. "I am sure, speaking for Madame Mirabel, that she will be duly conscious of your Ladyship's kind patronage, which we shall do our best to deserve—Miss Popple, bring me the primrose set, if you please," and as the assistant sped away, Pamela looked out of the window and remarked that it was a fine day. Now it was exactly according to the best tradition of shop etiquette that the customer's attention should be respectfully distracted during an enforced wait, by some polite conversation; and indeed, most of Miss Pounce's ladies had a good deal to say and a good deal to listen to, when fortune favoured them with a quiet moment in Miss Pounce's as they are over there—as straight," said Miss Pounce, turning up her fine eyes, "as any confection in this establishment. The newest idea, Madam Hat, robe and trimmings, down to the parasol all complete, all in harmony, as you perceive. The ve—ry lat—est id—e—a," said the milliner, dropping her syllables one by one, spreading the flounces and frills over a chair and poising the hat on her clenched hand. "Ex—qui—site, that's the word, isn't it, Miss? O, it will become either of your young ladies to perfection. The embroidered lawn, very delicate, very girlish, Madam. Absolutely correct for a young lady that's a debutante. Not white, Oh, no, your Ladyship, cream. Pull up the blinds over there, Miss Popple.—Cream,

But Lady Amelia was not so swiftly moved to decision. The garment was tried on and the beautiful Jane was turned and twisted in every direction; while her mother hummed and ha-ed and criticised

"I'm not so sure I like the green waist-ribbon, no, nor the primroses, neither, mere hedgerow flowers. A nice artificial garden rose, now, and a good blue taffety sash."

"O Mamma," protested the plain Miss Vibart in tones of anguish

"I couldn't do it, your Ladyship," said Pamela, with a slightly heightened colour, deftly whisking the hat from the fair head and motioning her underling to conduct the patient back behind the screen.

The two sat together on the maiden's bed, and Pamela began to cry, as women will, over the tender emotions of the moment.

company, but Lady Amelia gazed upon the milliner with an arrogance that marked her repressive intention, and then turned her head away and told Sarah to give her seat to Jane or the child would look a fright for the rout to-night.

Dear, to be sure, thought Miss Pounce, "to see that poor piece jump up, and her younger sister take her seat, all as if it were the most natural thing in the world, if that don't tell a tale! I wish 'twas the plain one I had the hatting of, I'd get some credit out of it. Why, if you put a sun bonnet on the beauty there, she'd look out of it, no more nor less than the same handsome doll—you've dropped your mouchoir, Miss."

Pamela handed the elder Miss Vibart back her useful linen handkerchief with a movement as deferential as if it had been the finest gossamer and valenciennes; and that young person took it with a pleasant smile, blew her nose in it lustily, and thrust it into her reticule, no whit ashamed of its sensible quality.

"That's the girl for my money," thought the observant shopwoman.

What a world in miniature was this show-room of hers! Pamela had already seen many a comedy, many a drama played out in it. Here was a case of Cinderella on the wrong sister. A shame it was to treat a nice young lady so, because she happened to have a little pug nose and a wide mouth

"La! Miss Popple, give me that. (One would think you'd had to go to Paris for it.) And straight from Paris it is, my Lady, and all the trouble in the world to get it through, things being a shade deeper than ivory, and the pale green ribbons, the blonde, your Ladyship sees, just flung over the hat and fastened with this bunch of primroses. Did your Ladyship ever behold anything more fanciful and pretty? I would not put a bit of ribbon or set another pin into that hat," said Miss Pounce, "not if you was to offer me a thousand pounds to do it! Oh, Paris ma'm. Yes, ma'am. Hot from Paris if one can use such a word for a thing so cool and April-like. Any young girl," said Miss Pounce, not without a spice of malice, "would be noted in such attire."

"O Mamma," said Jane. It was the first time she had spoken. She was gazing at her reflection in the mirror, crowned by the wonderful hat. Her voice was awestruck, as if she were overwhelmed by the sight of her own loveliness.

Lady Amelia pursed her lips, and then with some tartness bade her daughter turn round. As she obeyed, Miss Pounce seized the vapoury gown and cunningly held it up against the young lady's figure. A kind of maternal greed obviously struggled with prudence in Lady Amelia's heart. She gaped meltingly, then frowned, put her finger to her lip.

"Miss could try them all on," insidiously suggested Pamela Pounce.

"O Mamma," said Miss Jane Vibart, and:

"O Mamma," cried her sister. "Jenny looks a perfect picture in that hat, and I'm sure the dress is the most lovely thing I've ever laid eyes on. It would be a sin and a shame not to get them for her."

"It's the primrose and the green—your Ladyship will excuse me—that makes the real Parisian elegance of this gown. If your Ladyship requires ordinary English taste, there's Madame Flouncer's in Clarges Street, a very respectable firm, very respectable indeed, as I've heard tell, where your Ladyship would find herself better suited."

"Upon my word, young woman!" spluttered Lady Amelia.

"Yes, you may toss your old head, and sniff and snort, my Lady Amelia, thought the shopwoman, remaining herself quite imperturbable, save for that deepening colour, "but you'll not come it over me with your high nose and your country taste, and you needn't think it."

They gazed upon each other steadily for nearly a minute, then the dowager's glare wavered.

"It's an original effect of colour, I'll say that," she said weakly, "and—does that parasol go with it?"

Miss Pounce took up the minute article in question, shook out the fringe, opened it, and held it gracefully at divers angles.

"An ivory handle, your Ladyship perceives, cream poult de soie of the first quality, the sarcenet lining beautifully gathered, isn't it, Miss? a deeper shade of primrose, so becoming to the complexion, and such a background for the powder—really as never was."

"An ivory handle," said Lady Amelia pulling a long upper lip, "and fringe and what not! Absurd extravagance for a girl."

"It goes with the whole inspiration, my Lady. A cheap parasol or a wrong colour would—Foh! would destroy it all."

After which Lady Amelia fell to haggling. She demanded a personal interview with Madame Mirabel. She declared that the advantage to the firm of clothing the beautiful Miss Jane Vibart, if not sufficient compensation in itself, ought to make a considerable difference in the charges made.

Miss Pounce regretted that Madame Mirabel was not visible. Madame Mirabel could not be troubled on these matters. She who spoke was solely responsible for the department. She regretted that she could not regard the favour of clothing Miss Jane Vibart otherwise than as a business transaction. What was the price? Nothing! Twenty-five guineas—given away! Oh, no, my Lady, she did not think she could use up a square of her ladyship's old Honiton instead of the blonde. No, nor make it twenty guineas and throw in the parasol. It was a tremendous contest. Lady Amelia haggled with a zest and energy that spoke of long practice and an actual enjoyment of the process. Miss Pounce's cheeks were flaming when the transaction was at last concluded, and she had after all conceded a reduction of five pounds.

"And let it be a lesson to you, my dear," she said to Miss Pounce afterwards. "And when you see a customer come in with that kind of an air about her, put it up to her at once. What was the set marked at, Miss Pounce, dear? Eighteen? You don't say? Well, let that be a lesson to you."

"And do you want nothing for Miss?" enquired the astute milliner, turning with a kind smile to the plain girl. "I've a positive sweet of a Tuscan straw with cornflowers and a blue muslin. It would suit Miss to a charm. Very reasonable."

Lady Amelia, one stout foot poised for departure—she had a high aristocratic action suited to her nose—paused.

"Cheap? did you say?" she questioned.

"Miss Pounce, the blue muslin and the assorted chapeau."

Lady Amelia gazed through her eye-glass and Pamela rejoiced to see that she hesitated. Colour and sparkle had risen to the plain Miss Vibart's cheeks, and the flash of joy brought out all kinds of beauties, dimples, and tiny smile waves, and an archness in the curve of that too wide mouth over milk white teeth.

"Chapeau and robe," she said emphatically, "for you, my Lady, since your Ladyship has already so generously patronised us, and not to disappoint the young lady, eight guineas. Pray Miss, let my Lady see you in the hat."

Her hands lifted to her country straw, Sarah Vibart paused, looked at her mother, and the light died out of her eyes.

"Jane, you will want another gown," muttered Lady Amelia. "And blue was always your colour."

"O Mamma," said Jane, with a smile of joy that made her for the moment quite exasperatingly lovely.

It was that smile that settled her in Miss Pounce's opinion.

"Of all the mean, unnatural girls! This is a shame, I call it, a shame!" thought she.

If her business conscience would have allowed her, she would have placed the Tuscan on the beauty's head, and contrived to give the curls a good tweak as she did so. But as it was, she masked her feelings by handing the garments to her underling loftily commanding: "You carry on with the order, Miss Popple. Regretting Madam, I have an appointment," and sweeping majestically away.

As she did so, she in her turn dropped a pocket handkerchief, quite a dainty little article with an embroidered P. and a delicate edge of lace, smelling too of the lavender with which the Kentish mother kept her elegant town daughter liberally supplied.

The plain Miss Vibart made a plunge and picked it up.

"Good God, Sarah!" cried Lady Amelia, the exclamation jerked out of her by a proceeding so very unbecoming.

"Thank you, Miss," said Pamela, looking into the candid green eyes, that refused to acknowledge the rising tears. "I hope some day I'll have the dressing of you, and 'twill be a pleasure and privilege."

"Jane," cried her mother angrily, "don't stand staring, and if you poke like that I might as well throw all the money into the sea. Try on this hat this minute, and you may tell Madame Mirabel—you—you young woman—that I consider it very impertinent of the person who presides over the department to go away like this; a vast bit of disrespect and I've half a mind to cancel my orders. Hold your tongue, Jane. I would, if it were not that it might hurt the Duchess's feelings."

In spite of Lady Amelia's censure, it was scarce a fortnight afterwards when a very small page boy brought a very large folded sheet to Madame Mirabel's shop, marked immediate, which he was enjoined to deliver straight into the hands of Miss Pounce. This document ordered with equal imperativeness and urgency, that Madame Mirabel's principal woman should instantly proceed to 6a, Queen Street, bringing a selection of heads suitable for Miss Jane Vibart's wear that night at the masked ball at Hampshire House. "It is very important that the principal woman should come HERSELF." This was heavily underlined. "Lady Amelia Vibart must insist on her personal attendance."

"Hoighty, Toighty," said Miss Pounce, and stood looking down at the page with one hand on her hip, eyelids drooping, a quizzical smile and a tilted chin.

"And how'd it be if I can't give up my Duchesses and Marchionesses to whom I've been engaged for goodness gracious knows how long? There trot along, and tell my Lady I'll do my best, seeing she's so pressing! Yes, yes, I'll come. And shut your mouth, little boy, in the name of Heaven, or you'll be picked up for a frog and brought to the Royal Aquarium."

Number 6a, Queen Street was a small narrow house wedged in between two larger residences; one of those domiciles that seem made for the impecunious fashionable. Miss Pounce serenely preceded Madame Mirabel's liveried porter who negotiated an alarming array of bandboxes, not without some bumpings-up the narrow stairs, in the wake of the country footman. On the second floor landing she ordered the important chattels to be deposited, and bidding the porter have a hackney in half an hour, stood a monument of composure while the country footman knocked at the panels of the door.

There was a clamour within, voices, among which Lady Amelia's didactic tones could easily be distinguished, oburgations, lamentations, sobs. The footman invited Miss Pounce by a leer to share the joke, knocked louder, and at an exasperated "Come in," flung open the door. As Pamela entered the long, dingy bedroom a silence fell.

The beauty was sitting in an arm-chair by the empty fire-place, her face buried in her hands, evidently in tears; the elder sister was bending over her with a countenance of concern, while in the background stood a frightened-looking elderly maid, her finger to her lip.

"Come in, come in!" repeated Lady Amelia, bursting into speech. "Shut the door. I'm sorry to have troubled you, I'm sure. No. I don't want the bandboxes. Miss Jane Vibart cannot possibly go out to-night. She has most successfully contrived to make such a spectacle of herself that I doubt if she will be able to show again for the rest of the season."

"Oh, Mamma!" exclaimed the elder daughter in reproachful accents. "'Tisn't Jenny's fault!"

"You'll not say it's mine, I trust?" retorted a deeply annoyed parent, and, as the beauty lifted her face, Pamela saw that it was indeed disfigured almost out of recognition by that distressing if not alarming complaint, the tooth-ache. The poor girl's left cheek was swollen to comicality.

Jane Vibart, with a loud boo-hoo, buried her head in her handkerchief again, and Sally, with a championship which Pamela thought the younger ill deserved, protested: "But Mamma, Mr. Tugwell hurt her so dreadfully last time, that poor Jenny was terrified—"

"Foh! I've no patience with her," stormed the lady. "She'll have to have it out now, and 'twill hurt her a vast deal more. Provoking creature, and it is so important, so particularly important that she should go tonight. Well, Miss, if you lose your chance of the match of the year, you've none but yourself to blame, and let that be a comfort to you. Pray, young woman, did you not hear me say I should not require your goods? O! I could shed tears of vexation, and it all so neatly planned! The Duchess herself would have seen that you took the floor with Mr. W., and says she to me: 'The child has but to unmask at supper, and I think we may say 'tis as good as done.' Mr. W., his uncle's heir, and such a personable, worthy young man, by all accounts, and looking to be settled. Well, well! Meeking, take Miss Jane to her apartment, and tell Mrs. Martha to apply the leeches. 'Tis time for me to be dressing."

Whether rendered irritable by pain, or overwhelmed by disappointment at the probable loss of Mr. W., or goaded by the thought of the leeches, certain it is that the afflicted daughter broke out with a passion which amazed Miss Pounce so much that she turned on the threshold to stare, and perhaps even admire.

The beauty declared that Mamma was a nasty unkind thing, and that she herself wished she was dead.

"Jane!" cried Lady Amelia, in a voice of thunder. "Sarah, take your sister away."

Ere the sobbing girl, advancing in three totters and a stop to gasp, could reach the door, Lady Amelia bethought herself of a fitting punishment which spoke volumes for the matron's methods of education.

"Your sister shall go in your place to-night. Yes, Jane, not another word. I have quite made up my mind. Sarah, get ready to accompany me."

Pamela slipped out of the room after the girls, and was witness on the landing of a small fraternal scene which confirmed her previous opinion of the lovely Jane. This aggrieved maiden first nearly fell over the bandboxes, and then was seized by such a convulsion of rage and jealousy at sight of them, that, shaking herself free of Sarah's encircling arm, she slapped and pinched her sister, and then, at Pamela's horrified interference, dashed up the staircase to her own chamber.

"Pon my word," thought the milliner, "Mr. W. may have had the escape of his life! A doll lined with a vixen! 'Tis the most dismal combination. Don't cry, Miss," she went on aloud, as Sarah sniffed into her useful pocket handkerchief, "don't cry, there's a dear young lady! Let me come in your room with you, and see what I've got in these boxes: You shall look nice to-night, or my name's not Pamela Pounce."

Now Sarah's chamber happened to be a narrow slit at the back of her mother's apartment, for of course Beauty had to be well lodged, no matter how pokily plain Miss Sarah might fare.

Nipping a bunch of bandboxes dexterously in each hand, Pamela bundled after the astonished Cinderella into her dingy little cell.

"As for the price, Miss, bless you," she whispered breathlessly, with her back against the door. "You'll pay me when you're married." Then she smacked her lips as if the dish of her choice were spread before her. "I don't know when I've took to any one as I've took to you. La! We must have candles though, your window giving on a shaft as I see, and being, so to speak, worse than none. But I'd rather dress a lady by candle-light, any day in the year. And what was you thinking of wearing, Miss?"

"O dear, I'm sure I don't know!" cried Sarah. "My muslins are dreadful washed out, and Mamma said I must do with her mauve Tabby made over, for she couldn't afford to dress two—"

Here there came a knock at the door, and Meeking, the drab elderly maid, entered, carrying a white silk brocade gown, powdered over with little rose-buds.

"My Lady says you're to wear this, Miss Sally, and I'm mortal glad," added the woman, dropping her voice and looking, as if for support, at the milliner, "that you should come to your rights once in a while! Too bad the way this pore young lady's put upon, Miss. There! I've said it now, and I'm glad of it. Her Ladyship's just given me notice. I wish I could dress you, Miss Sally, I do indeed, but I've got to go back to your Mamma this instant minute."

"Don't you put yourself out, Ma'am," cried Miss Pounce, sweetly. "I'll help your young lady with all the pleasure in life! I was just about to show her the heads I brought on approval."

"Ah!" said the Abigail darkly, as she withdrew, "there's heads enough in this house to-night, and that's the truth!"

"I hardly like, though," exclaimed Sarah, "to wear poor Jenny's clothes."

"Why, you're a sweet creature!" The milliner shook out the glistening folds. "'Twill suit you, Miss—"

"Oh, my ugly face!"

"Ugly! As far as that comes to, Miss Vibart, there's ugly beauties, and there's charming—well, charming uglinesses, since that's your own word. I'd never call a lady ugly who'd so fine a figure, and so bright an eye—and if your mouth is a bit wide, Miss, sure your teeth are a picture; and if your nose is a trifle snub, there's something so merry and arch in the way it cocks when you smile, that I for one would not have you different. I vow I would not!"

Pamela was in the act of passing the Beauty's fine gown over Cinderella's shoulders, and as she twitched it into place she proceeded with fresh energy.

"What's the matter with you, Miss, is that you've been so set aside that you're afraid to smile and be merry. Let yourself go to-night, and you'll see—"

"Why 'twill be right enough," said Sarah ruefully, "so long as I'm masked—all the dancing ladies are to be masked, you know. I'm not afraid but I can hold my own then. 'Tis the thought that all the while people are looking at me they're saying 'poor girl,' and comparing me with sister. However I may get on with my partner at the rout to-night, the moment I take off my mask—"

"Now, don't go for to say that, Miss! You haven't seen the head I've got in this bandbox. One would think," cried the milliner enthusiastically, "that your good angel had inspired me, for I've got here the very mode to match Miss Jane's brocade and to suit you. Well, there! There won't be no gentleman at the ball to-night, wishing you was your sister. I'll take my oath o' that."

And indeed, when some twenty minutes later the plain Miss Vibart contemplated her image in the glass, she conceded that she might very well hold her own. By a couple of twists of clever fingers, Pamela Pounce had contrived to loosen and display her curls to an advantage hitherto undreamt of. When a hairdresser was called in, his services were not wasted on Sarah. And the "head"; what an exquisite indescribable trifle, and how becoming! The twist of silver tissue as light as the most delicate cloud, the single hint of blue, and the one full pink rose! It lent an ethereal aspect to the flying curls of powdered hair; Sarah's small round face took a something elfin, and, as she smiled at herself, roguish, that made the milliner clap her hands and vow that she was delicious, and that her own anticipations were far exceeded.

Sarah turned and hugged her unexpected friend before obeying her mother's call.

"I'll come round to Madame Mirabel's in the morning and tell you all about it. See if I don't."

Miss Sarah Vibart looked so modest and inconspicuous as she slipped into Madame Mirabel's hat shop on the thundery June morning after the Masked Rout at Hampshire House, that Miss Popple deemed it not worth her while to enquire what her pleasure might be.

"Foh!" thought Polly. "Some poor country cousin on the spy for fashion," for no one can be so haughty as the young person who caters for the high and mighty.

What was her surprise to see the head milliner conclude the affairs of a most important dowager in perfunctory haste with a peremptory, "Door, Miss Quigly," and advance with the most urgent courtesy to the customer in the plain print gown, with the unmistakable home-trimmed hat, and the not at all pretty face underneath it!

"Step with me into the dressing-room, Miss Vibart. I've got your matinee ready to fit on," said Pamela, with a knowing wink.

And when the two found themselves together in the little screened off apartment with the big mirror, Miss Pounce scanned her companion's face with the most searching anxiety. There was something in that face that had not been there before, an emotion between

Pioneering in the Clay Belt

By Mabel Burkholder

SUCCESSFUL pioneering in any country depends on the person undertaking the work. In the first place, you must make up your mind to pioneer. Woe betide you, if when you go to live in the new north, you cherish a secret hankering for all the refinements and conveniences left behind! You can't expect the luxuries you enjoyed back home. Remember, you have run away from the high cost of living, so you must forego many of the comforts money can buy.

It's best to go into it with a keen sense of humor. Humor in pioneering is what springs are to a buggy. It will ease many a bump as you go jolting along over the untried trails of your new life.

During my rather extended holiday this year in the agricultural belt around Cochrane, I made a particular study of the women who have gone out to establish homes there. I take it there are many other women in the older parts of the country who are giving serious thought to the very same question. Unemployment in the cities drives many a family to the land, and after all there is no better place for a young couple to make their start and raise their family.

Though I talked and visited intimately with many women in New Ontario, I did not run across any of the complaining or homesick type. Doubtless that kind are there, but most of the women I met were jolly, talkative, rough and ready in dress, resourceful, courageous, and excellent companions for their husbands. They were very fond of out-door life, and did not mope in the house; when there was a chance to go to town or to a neighbor's place with their men-folks, they invariably bundled the children into the rig and all went along. They thought nothing of going ten or fifteen miles to a dance, a party, or a church concert.

It struck me forcibly that people do not have to work over-hard for a living up north. Though it was late summer, the busiest season of all, these people had ample leisure. Things seemed to come to them without much effort, and their wants were few and simple. One might have to guard against developing the habits of an Indian, the roving, hunting sort of existence, and the dislike for steady concentrated work.

It's easier to pioneer than to live the life of a working-woman in the cities. A few things are not so easy, to be sure. A woman must bake her own bread, and when she wants fruit for winter she must get out and pick the quantities of wild raspberries and blue-berries that grow in every nook and corner. She must cook with a wood fire, instead of with gas or electricity. But that's not to be compared with the grind of living in the cities. Up north, living is cheap, and leisure is abundant.

The high cost of living is the prime cause that forces people out of an old settled district into a new. The burden of over-civilization becomes intolerable, and people find it easy to be contented in a country where the taxes are negligible, and the coal shortage isn't even discussed.

When you compare the new north with conditions under which our grandparents cleared southern Ontario, you must agree that the modern settler can hardly claim to be pioneering at all in the hardest sense of the word. In the olden days the speediest conveyance was an ox-team, and people had to wait weeks and months for letters from dear ones. Now fast trains bring in supplies daily, mail is distributed with regularity, while automobiles, aeroplanes, and telegraph lines connect the settler up with the outside world.

THE north waits for the coming of the right kind of women to complete the work of settlement. Some are there already, but many more are needed, and of a high type. There are a great many men there who are leading a roving, solitary, unsatisfactory sort of life, "batching," perhaps, in one-roomed log shacks. These places do sorely need the loving touch of a woman to convert them into homes.

Shall we peep into a bachelor's shack, while he is away a week at a time working on the railroad construction? The aspect from without is forlorn enough. There is no soft green grass about the house to do duty as a lawn, for it takes years to coax that kind of grass to grow nicely; and though the forest is so full of trees, there is not one to act as a shade to the house and keep off the fierce bright rays of the summer sun. Once inside, we see that the whole place is lined with building paper, which keeps out the cold, but does not give a smooth attractive surface to the walls.

house, with its fine background of forest, she will delight in the roaring wood fires of winter; but let him see to it that some beautifying touches are added to the little homestead as years slip along. A woman's soul languishes on monotony and ugliness.

Of itself the north is neither monotonous nor ugly. It is very beautiful. But man in his first rush to make money has taken all he can get and left nothing in its place; hence the many desolate, half-abandoned shacks one sees everywhere in the north. That must gradually be changed, and homes that are real homes

They bundle the children into the rig and go along

The house is really a marvel of compact completeness. In the centre of the room stands a collapsible, sheet-iron stove, which can be shut up and packed on the owner's back, should he decide to fold his tent and quietly steal away. The stove really divides the room into two. On one side is a bed, covered with heavy blankets and a patch-work quilt brought from home; on the other side is a rude table, a wood-box, and a couple of home-made chairs, which, though strong, are neither soft nor springy.

The Monday morning dishes, with the remains of a pot of tea, stand on the table, as they have stood all week; and behind the stove a rude cupboard shows dishes, and supplies, such as flour, beans, and baking powder.

must take their places.

There is a tendency on the part of the women who have lived there for a few years to let down on the little niceties and refinements of life. Many look ten years older than they are, because of their sunbaked complexions, their wispy hair, and neglected teeth. Even the children show the same neglect. These conditions do not need to continue. Perhaps it is a hard country on hair and complexion, but a judicious use of cold creams, and careful brushing of the hair would do for them what it does for women in any other part of the country.

One thing that makes it hard to preserve the little niceties of life is the fact that the people live in crowded quarters. All the houses are small, and most of the families are large. Frequently livingroom, kitchen,

A "school marm" who turned pioneer

It gives a woman a queer catch in the throat to look around. She will pause before the faded family photograph on the wall, and wonder if the young man's mother is still living, and if she sometimes sends him boxes packed with jams and pickles, and padded with a few pairs of home-made socks.

The bachelor's home has comfort, but it sadly lacks beauty. It cries out for the feminizing touch. To a woman the aesthetic is vital. She is starved by the unbecoming. The man who brings a bride to one of those log shacks must look to it that he gives her more than the bare essentials of living. She will love the log and bed-room are all the same apartment, and when the family is so fortunate as to have an upstairs to the house, it is one unfinished room, where, perhaps, nothing more than a flannelette blanket is hung to divide the women's sleeping apartment from the men's. In such a place there is no privacy. You put up a regular fight when you decide you must take a bath. Often you must carry water from the lake or river before you can clean your teeth. And you realize sadly as you go upstairs and blow out your light to get enough privacy to go to bed, that pine boards do not a prison make, nor flannelette blankets a cage.

WOMEN also pine for educational and religious privileges. I was in some localities where children, remote from any school, were being taught to read and write by their mothers. I was in a Sunday school where the attendance for the day was eight. The little Sunday school in the village of Clute, twelve miles north of Cochrane, has been appropriately named "Hope of Clute." All honor to those who go ahead and break the trails in an educational and religious sense, for the oncoming generation is truly the hope, not only of towns like Clute, but of the whole north country.

Mercy on us! What a lot of home-making there is, awaiting the arrival of the right kind of women up there! The bachelors flock to any place where there are eligible women, and the arrival of a young lady school-teacher is an epoch-making event. They told me of a new teacher by the name of Miss Free. Fine name—what? I wonder how long she remained free!

There is a splendid, if unpolished, chivalry among men of the north which gives them a high place in the regard of women. "The best men in the world!" I heard one woman traveller affirm to another: "they can make you a house out of nothing, or a bed, table, or chair out of nothing, and they are never fussed when it comes to getting up a meal. They are the last word in resourcefulness—they can always think of something to do in an emergency."

Resourceful! That's it! Necessity has been the mother of some queer inventions with them. For example a northern bachelor has improved on the common idea of a dust-pan by sweeping the dirt down the cracks of the kitchen floor.

"I seldom wash dishes," one man asserts. "What's the use, when there's always a hungry dog sniffing along, willing to lick 'em off."

They asked one northern cook, "Do you ever use a recipe book?"

"No," he replied; "They all start, 'Take a clean dish'—and that's too much for me."

The northern settlers appreciate comforts and are getting them as fast as they can; but "style," as it is known in the cities, hasn't made a very strong appeal so far. In one locality I found two or three families who hob-nobbed together, but were shunned by the rest of the neighbors. They were trying to introduce afternoon teas, and sat around in front of their log houses rigged out in silk dresses with white shoes. They had even heard of "egg-coseys" and were displaying a few of them. Their attempt at style was forced and most incongruous, and if the contempt of their neighbors could have withered them, they would have been consumed long ago.

So you see the kind of woman you must be if you contemplate pioneering in the north. First you must have a well-developed sense of humor. And then you must be resourceful, and able to turn your hand to almost any emergency; yet this does not mean that you'll work harder for a living than you did in holding down your job back home.

You will have to put resolutely from your memory the luxuries you have left behind, and let your mind dwell on the advantages you are going to enjoy, the relatively low cost of living, the taxes which are negligible, the promise of soon owning your farm, the abundance of fuel, fish, and game, and the freedom from the conventions of an over-crowded civilization. If you are that kind of woman you will be the adored of some man up here, who appreciates to a more than ordinary degree the little touches a woman can bring into a home.

Of course no one will believe you when you try to tell them what northern air and sunshine are like, or when you insist that people don't dread the winters up there, planning most of their sports for that season. Yet the fact remains that the country exerts a wonderful tonic influence on all comers, and many women who went to live there unwillingly have remained to enjoy the health they found among the spruce and balsam forests.

You may go there a near-wreck, physically, mentally, or financially, but if you stay long enough the country is almost sure to work a cure on you. So many, too, go up there with a past they would like to forget. The North asks no questions, demands no credentials. It takes you just as it finds you. That's what I think is the very best thing about it—it's the country of the second chance!

"HOW can you think of leaving mother, Ann Perkins?" Maggie asked suddenly as she looked up from the letter she was reading. "You know she shouldn't stay alone!"

Ann had been expecting that question from the instant she had seen Maggie coming from the post-office with the blue envelope in her hand. She might have known that Gertie would tell Maggie everything.

"But mother needn't stay alone. I could ask Cousin Eliza to come and live with her this winter." Ann protested feebly.

But even before she spoke she knew how futile it was. It had been the same a few years ago when she had wanted to do welfare work. She longed to become someone; to do something. She felt that her life was being wasted, that even missionary work, difficult as it was, would be preferable to being a nonentity. She did not like being the old maid aunt—at the beck and call of her mother, her sisters or any of her relatives. The conviction was slowly growing on her that she would have had more freedom if she had married.

She must not go to the city to take up the work she wanted to do because mother would be alone; and she could not take her mother with her because her mother did not like living in cities. If Maggie in Saskatoon had a baby, Ann must go immediately to look after the other children; or if Gertie's children in Elmira developed chicken-pox, Ann must hurry and help her to take care of them—there was no question of her mother being left alone then. Ann had just begun to see how onesided it was. Here was her friend Emily Stevens who wanted to be a nurse; she was entering hospital training school in September. It was a splendid opportunity for Ann to go with her. She could graduate and later take a post-graduate course in one of the larger hospitals. Thus her ambition to become a social service worker would be realized.

But here was the old objection—mother must not be left alone.

"Couldn't mother live with you?" Ann was struggling feebly against the inevitable.

"Why, Ann, I shouldn't think you would be so selfish. You know mother wants to live at home."

Ann did not want to give Maggie the satisfaction of seeing her cry yet she felt that she was near the breaking point; hurriedly gathering her things together she ran upstairs to her room.

Of course she had brought it on herself. She shouldn't have written to Gertie about her plans. It would have been better perhaps to have spoken to Maggie first—but what difference! Nothing would make them see that she had a right to her own life.

Maggie and the children had come east for a little change and a rest. Ann bitterly resented this, why should they come home for a change. She needed one as badly as they did; and four children even if they are angels make a lot of work—but Maggie's children were not angels.

She felt that she was a sort of upper servant—a mother's help with privileges. Soon she would be thirty. It was all because she had not married, she told herself a little grimly. She wondered what Maggie would say if she knew Jim had asked her to marry him long before he had thought of Maggie. And then there had been Sam Johnson; he had asked her several times but she had been too ambitious, then. And now—she might just as well have married for all that she had accomplished. Maggie and Gertie could have hired someone to do their work quite easily. They wouldn't have thought of asking her to help them if she had married.

"Ann! Ann!" Isn't it almost time for supper? It was Maggie's shrill voice calling.

Ann dried her eyes quickly and hurried down to the kitchen.

When she opened the door bedlam greeted her. Jimmie was calling for eggs; Tom wanted the meat left over from dinner; little Sarah Ann must have "somep'n fussy." Maggie thought a poached egg would do nicely for her. Ann after some little trouble finally satisfied them but felt too tired and dispirited to touch any food herself.

AFTER supper Maggie put the baby to bed while Ann and her mother washed the dishes. Ann had never spoken to her mother about her ambition

There was silence for a few moments, broken only by the old bull-frog. "Isn't it wonderful out here to-night?" Ann said hurriedly nor had the other girls, to her knowledge, therefore she was quite surprised when Mrs. Perkins spoke suddenly, "Were you thinking of going away, Ann?"

Ann swished the soap around in her dish-pan before she spoke.

"Whatever made you ask that, mother,"

"I saw a circular or something that came for you a while back. I was sure it had the name of some hospital or other on it. Didn't you want to be a nurse some years ago?"

"I did want to be one, years and years ago—but now, I'm going to stay with you." Ann managed to say that with a certain degree of cheerfulness which evidently deceived her mother.

Mrs. Perkins said nothing further.

The next morning brought a telegram from Saskatoon for Maggie. It was from Jim. The landlord had sold their house and they must find another within the month. Maggie must return immediately.

Ann couldn't help a feeling of relief stealing over her. Yet at the same time, she was afraid that she would be asked to go with Maggie to help her with the children. But during the excitement Maggie had apparently forgotten Ann. She was too busy packing and cramming things into trunks and bags and getting the children ready for the journey. Ann breathed a little more freely when the time came for them to leave and still nothing had been said of her going, too. It was just when Sam Johnson drove up in his livery car to take them to the station that a sudden gleam shot into Maggie's eye.

"Ann, you really could help me a lot—" But Sam with a ready insight into the situation—after a sly look at Ann's face, quickly bundled Maggie and the children into his car, cutting her sentence short with "You'll have to hurry if you're going to catch that train, you know." Sam could see that Ann was pleased.

Maggie had only time to settle herself comfortably before they were off. There were wavings and shrill good-byes. Ann waved good-bye from the front door.

The house settled down once more to its accustomed quiet.

Meanwhile Ann busied herself in the house and in the garden, looking after the vegetables and the flowers. She liked the summers in the sleepy old village; everything was so peaceful and homely. Even the houses looked half asleep with their shutters closed to the mid-day sun. Sometimes a neighbor dropped in or leant over the fence to gossip with Ann or her mother. And occasionally there were dull church affairs—and more gossip. She wished she could spend her summers here as Gertie and Maggie did. On the other hand how she hated the winters! She found the enforced idleness of the long nights almost unbearable; moreover the house was cold and uncomfortable. Then the next moment Ann reproached herself for her disloyalty. Now that Maggie had gone and was not there to criticize Ann's conduct, Ann's conscience did it for her. She thought of the verse which she had opened her Bible at, that morning. "Blessed are the meek." Ann told herself that she was a great deal meeker now than when Maggie and the children were with her. Somehow, Maggie and Gertie always made her feel rebellious.

Then about two weeks after the departure of Maggie came a letter from her. She hoped they were both well and she did hope that Ann had given up all idea of leaving mother. They liked their new home very much and were going to move into it in a few weeks. In a postscript she wanted to know if Ann would come and stay with the children in December while she and Jim went to Vancouver.

Ann had to repeat "Blessed are the meek" to herself a number of times that day.

* * *

A week or so afterward Ann had the "surprise of her life" as she told her friend Emily Stevens later. She was sitting behind a bush rooting the dandelions out of their neat little lawn. So absorbed was she with her thoughts that she did not notice her mother's presence until she caught her name. Mrs. Perkins was standing at the gate talking to Sam's mother.

"You ain't thought any more about comin' to Florida with us, have you, Mrs. Perkins?"

"I can't leave Ann very well," Mrs. Perkins was saying. "She likes it here. I've asked her once or twice if she wouldn't like to be a nurse or live somewhere else in the winter but she's always turned it away. I'd like real well to go to Florida—I've always had a kind of hankerin' to see oranges and lemons growing on trees—"

"Well, you think it over again, Mrs. Perkins, we'd like real well to have you come with us this winter—if you can manage it. You can just as well sit in the back seat as not—you don't take up much room." And she let a fat chuckle escape. "Sam's goin' to drive us you know he's been doing real well—"

But Ann did not hear the rest—her mother wanted to go to Florida!

To say that Ann was speechless with astonishment was putting it mild.

She was too dazed to do anything for a few moments. Then she rose to her feet. She did not know whether to dance with joy or sing—or do both. But instead she waited until her mother was alone and then running up to her breathlessly demanded.

"Is it true, mother,—what I heard you and Mrs. Johnson talking about. Do you really want to go to Florida this winter?"

Mrs. Perkins looked like a child caught with a jar of jam—a little guilty and a trifle troubled.

But Ann laughed, "And here I wanted to be a nurse but did not want to leave you alone. And you wanted to go to Florida—"

But her mother gasped, "Why sakes! alive, Ann, I thought you wanted to stay here!"

"And I thought you wanted to!"

Ann took her mother upstairs and showed her the stealthily prepared uniforms and nurses' equipment. Mrs. Perkins not to be outdone unlocked her desk and there stowed away were—board of commerce circulars, maps and general information about Florida.

Suddenly the same thought struck the two conspirators. They looked at each other aghast. What would Gertie and Maggie say!

Ann recovered first, "I've finished being meek," she said briefly.

* * *

That evening after the supper dishes had been washed, Mrs. Perkins hurried away to tell Mrs. Johnson the good news, while Ann walked down to the gate and stood in her favourite position, with her arms resting along the top of it. It was dusk. She could see the trees standing out against the sky like sentinels. In the long grass the fireflies were just beginning to show their flickering lights. In the distance a bull-frog boomed out breaking the stillness. Never had the place seemed so attractive to Ann. And then from the bushes down the road came the faint sweet smell of the wild roses. The air was fragrant with it. Somehow as she breathed its subtle sweetness she was dissatisfied with her life as she had planned it. It seemed empty. A vague longing which she could not define took possession of her. Whatever was the matter with her!

At that moment there was a footstep on the sidewalk and she was somewhat startled to find someone beside her.

"Sam!" she said, wondering to herself how she knew who it was so quickly.

"I've been wanting to see you," Sam said slowly.

"Were you—won't you come in?" Ann asked shyly.

"Let us stay out here." There was silence for a few moments broken only by the old bull-frog.

"Isn't it wonderful out here to-night?" Ann said hurriedly, "And can you smell the wild roses?" Then she wondered what made her face so hot.

"Ann!" said Sam suddenly. He must have felt her magic, too. He moved toward her. But she did not stir. Her eyes were resting on something unseen, some thing that brought a smile to her lips.

"Ann." He repeated softly. He reached his hand almost timidly it seemed and touched her arms on the gate. "Your mother has just told me that you were thinking of going away to be a nurse. I can't bear to think of your doing that—I want you to stay here—will you stay and look after me, dear?"

And Ann, shameless Ann, after overcoming so many difficulties did not even vouchsafe her career a parting thought as she walked through the gate straight into Sam's outstretched arms.

WHAT HAPPENED AT BED-TIME

A rolling hill, set with birch trees, shelters a stretch of beaver-meadow and marshland from the north winds. Here on the southern slope, on sunny November mornings, gather many of the outdoor people to gossip, to play, or to pretend that it still is summertime.

There was one particular morning, when, after the sun had fairly risen, one might have thought that Autumn days were still to come. Earlier in the morning, however, each blade of grass and each leaf had been covered with a velvet-white rime of hoar-frost, that disappeared at the first touch of sunlight leaving a world of dew-covered freshness. There was a lazy softness in the air, a haze of soft, smoky blue that robbed the sun of its flame and left it glowing redly.

"If I had not lived around here all my life, I would think that winter was not going to come at all this year," said an outdoor chap to himself. "Maybe I have put on my winter clothes a bit too soon."

It was Old Judge Fuzzer, the bobcat, who had spoken, and he was stretched out on the limb of an oak that grew half-way down the slope. He had not noticed that he had been speaking aloud, and nearly tumbled off the limb with surprise when a somewhat hoarse, but pleasant voice just below him said:

"Talking in your sleep, Judge?"

The bobcat peered down over the side of the limb and looked straight into the upturned face of Old Pop Porcupine.

"O no, I wasn't asleep," laughed the bobcat. "But what are you doing here this morning?"

"I was sitting here thinking about bed-time," said the prickly fellow.

Old Judge Fuzzer was curious, and clambered down the tree and over to where the porcupine was sitting. "Bed-rime? Bed-time!" said the bobcat, looking hard at his quill-coated friend.

"Indian-summer bed-time," said the porcupine. "Bed-time for everyone. This time of the year is bed-time for those who go to bed, for those who won't go to bed, and for those who run away because they don't want to go to bed."

"Ho! Ho! Ho!" laughed Old Judge Fuzzer. "I'm one of the won't-go-to-bed chaps. You are, too, Pop. Supposing we walk about and see just who are putting on their night-caps."

The porcupine humped himself up on his four feet, and with the furred and whiskered bobcat, walked slowly down the hillside.

In the lowest part of the little dip in the ground they came upon an old friend, who was so busy that he gave only a grumpy word or two in greeting. Master Warty Waddles, the toad, was making his bed. That squat, fat fellow was digging a hole directly underneath himself, and as he dug he disappeared slowly, under the covering of soft, brown earth.

Not far away, Old Grimmer, the woodchuck, nosed about sleepily after soft leaves and grass, the last of his winter bed-clothes.

Dop, the ring-tailed raccoon, blinked curiously from a tree-hole, and Saucebox, the chipmunk, from his doorway in the same tree, chattered and scolded. Above them, along the top of the ridge, they could see Paddytoes, the brown bear, making his way toward the cave on one of the larger hills where he would sleep through the cold days.

"All of them going to bed," said Old Pop Porcupine. "I suppose the birds have all flown southward by this time. They are the ones who run away because they don't want to go to bed."

"Not all the birds, Pop," said a loud, harsh voice.

The porcupine and the bobcat turned quickly, and saw the speaker, Talky Tooter, the bluejay. "Bluebirds and bobolinks have gone, Ruby-throats and robins, martins and many, many more who cannot stand the cold days. But I'm going to stay, if only to keep Old Judge Fuzzer out of mischief, and cousin Gray Jack, the Canada Jay, will be here to keep me company."

"You like company so well, Master Talky," said the bobcat, "that I would think you would spend the winter where there are lots of houses and boys and girls. So many of your feathered friends have gone away."

"If every house had a balsam grove about it, I would like that, if it were not for the sparrows that would be there too. Saucy, impudent chatterers!" said the bluejay.

Biff! Bang! A ball of brownish feathers buffeted the bluejay on either side of his head, and, with a screaming squawk, Master Talky Tooter flew hurriedly toward the balsam grove, pursued by Spic and Span, the English sparrows.

"Old Uncle Antler, the moose, will be here all winter," said Old Pop Porcupine, "Ranger, the wolf, and—see who's here!"

Master Whitey Weasel was walking toward them, stepping on tip-toe, and holding his nose up very proudly.

"Ho! Ho!" laughed Old Judge Fuzzer, as soon as he saw the weasel.

"Don't look so proud and haughty in your fine new fur; You're nose, and you're naughty, As you always were."

"My clothes have got nothing to do with my manners," said Whitey Weasel. "You may not like me, but you can't help liking my new suit."

The bobcat could not help but agree, for the weasel had changed his summer coat of dirty brown to snow-white fur, all but one little bit, a jet-black tip to his tail.

After the weasel had gone on his way, the porcupine and the bobcat came upon a flock of little, slate-colored birds perching together on the shady side of the shadiest evergreen on the hill. They looked so solemn that the bobcat inquired what the trouble was.

"We're juncos," replied one of the little grey birds. "We fly Southward with the winter, not away from it. I'm afraid we came too fast this time, though."

"It's hard to find days that suit everyone," said Old Pop Porcupine to the bobcat, "but,

When summer ends, why worry
That Winter's Storms and flurry
The Indian Summer's smoky haze,
Those last, delightful Autumn days,
Come after in a hurry.

The folk of hill and hollow,
If Winter 'frights, may follow,
To some far, sunny Southern clime
Of ever—ever Summertime
The bluebird or the swallow.

When fleet their way they've taken,
Some summer friends, forsaken,
Each in a cosy winter-bed
Curls up—a dozy sleepy-head,
'Till Spring's warmth will awaken

But some of us remember
What lies beyond November

HEARING NOVEMBER

A traveller once said that he could recognize any great city in the world, as soon as he entered it, by the smells that greeted him. Less amusing, but far more reasonable is this—each month has its own distinctive sounds, twelve different tunes to be heard each year.

March and November are alike in that both are changeful, a deceiving calm followed by wild stormy outburst. But November has a music all its own.

It has been raining, and with the patter of the still dripping eaves I hear the brushing rustle of falling leaves. The clouds are broken, but let little sunshine through; the wind is rising again and sways the almost leafless tree-tops, singing its shrill song as it rushes down from the North West. It is not long until the sky is clear again, of wind-washed blue, and the sun of late Autumn beams with a tempered brilliance.

The black squirrel comes to his tree-hole doorway, and cracks a nut as he looks at the weather. He chatters too, and there is a new note in his voice that tells me he is saying: "Ho! Ho! November is here. My storehouse is full. A snug home and a stuffed pantry. What care I for November storms?"

Quite near me, hopping to and fro on the fallen leaves, are two English sparrows. Their chirping tells of appetites sharpened by November air; they are practicing for the days of saucy begging when I resume my winter habit of strewing crumbs to them.

A cat tip-toes along the gravel walk and mews at the door. Tom has a horror of wet feet, and has no liking for November days out of doors.

I hear the nuthatch and the grosbeak, and the finch is in the evergreen. I am tempted to brave the uncertain weather and tramp to the woods, just to see what Little People are out to-day. But the wind blows colder, and I am content to stay at my open window, look, and listen.

A cricket tunes his shadow-violin over by the hearth, where the fire burns brighter; and I can fancy sparks in the smoke that the wind whisks so quickly away from the chimney-top.

The sky is overcast again with ragged masses of cloud, the wind has risen to a gale, and the straining branches of the trees creak and groan. There is a swift patter of rain upon the leaves. A swirling gust lashes in and leaves my face rain-wet. I close my window and turn to the cheerful fire within. I have heard November

Teaching without words

LOVELY CHILDREN! What a struggle it seems, sometimes, to keep them so!

Yet mothers can give them a momentous start toward cleanliness and beauty—merely by suggestion and example.

We know one understanding mother who teaches cleanliness by this simple plan:

She talks about how good it makes her feel to be clean. She leaves her own cake of Ivory Soap where the children can easily reach it. And she leaves other cakes wherever they wash.

This mother knows how quick youngsters are to imitate, and she finds that these cakes of Ivory do their gentle, but thorough, cleansing with hardly a word from her to the children.

Ivory is the nicest soap you can imagine for your children and for you. It cleans safely—that is what all soaps should do. And while it is cleaning, you experience with Ivory all the delightfulness of the seven most desirable qualities of fine soap — purity, mildness, whiteness, fragrance, rich lather, rinsing promptness, and “It Floats.”

With all seven of these desirable qualities, Ivory is naturally the favorite soap of most mothers.

Surmounted by a chair-rail that is painted white to match the balance of the woodwork, a dado of pale gray painted-canvas extends around this pleasantly-appointed nursery. The upper walls are hung with an unpatterned French gray paper that forms an ideal background for the many pictures used in the room. Gray, also, is the basic coloring of the rag rugs, although enlivened by touches of white, blue, yellow and green. Most of the furniture is modern, finished in white to match the woodwork; but several pieces of old mahogany lend an air of becoming stability to a room in which the architectural character leaves little to be desired.

The Child's Own Corner

By Collier Stevenson

THERE is a vast amount of discussion to-day as to the relative potency of the influences exerted by heredity and environment upon the individual. Heredity—fortunately or unfortunately, as the case may be—we must accept at the hands of our ancestors: whereas we can to a great extent individually control environment. It would seem, therefore, that we are justified in assuming the power of environment to surpass that of heredity. And where can the influence of environment more readily or more effectively be wielded than in the home?

Beauty of form and of color—a beauty extending to each room of the house and to every part of the garden—should dominate the home as one very important element in the creation of a superlatively desirable environment. That surely is obvious. Nevertheless, how frequently in the modern Canadian home is a room utterly destitute of attractiveness in either form or coloring thrust upon the child of the house! Indeed, in many instances, the child's room is nothing but a repository for furniture, which, because it has long outlived its sightliness, is deemed unfit for any other room in the house.

Were parents confronted by the direct query as to the cause of this evident neglect of a golden opportunity, they would in all probability claim either that children are not interested in attractive surroundings or are too destructive to deserve good furniture in their rooms. As a matter of fact, neither of these claims is quite true. Beautiful objects, more especially those of pronounced coloring, are almost invariably appealing to a child: hence a room equipped with beautiful furniture is very likely to develop in the child-occupant a sense of prideful possession that will prevent either the misuse or the abuse of the furnishings.

When at all practicable, it is an excellent idea to further that very sense of possession by dedicating to each child a separate bedroom, arranged to form, by the addition of a pleasantly-appointed day-nursery or playroom, a comprehensive suite—convenient to, yet quite apart from, the sleeping quarters of the older members of the family. Still another commendable plan has as its basis a well-lighted playroom communicating with a sleeping-porch, a dressing-room and a bathroom. Sometimes, too, the sleeping-porch is equipped with an especially high parapet, in order that it may be safely utilized as an outdoor playroom during inclement weather. These, however, are schemes which involve rather more expenditure than the average family budget can encompass.

Even in the house which in size does not admit the setting aside of two or more rooms to form the idealistic arrangement of communicating day-nursery, sleeping rooms and bath, it is entirely possible to create a very satisfactory domain for the younger folk of the household. Primarily, the room chosen for this important purpose should be fairly generous in area and still more prodigal in the matter of sunlight and ventilation. Windows upon two or three sides there ought to be: and there should be a Southerly exposure—with a secondary outlook either towards the East or West. Sunniness and good cheer will thereby be assured throughout the busy hours of daylight.

Closets are, perhaps, nowhere more important than in a room used by children, where they invite to the formation of orderly habits. Their equipment should, of course, be scaled to the size of the users; the lower hooks placed at a height easily accessible, the drawers or racks for shoes at a point readily available. Outdoor wraps and any infrequently-used accessories can then be stored in the upper part of the closets. A roomy closet, equipped with built-in shelves for toys, is one feature which should by all means be incorporated. Beneath a hinged window-seat, additional storage-space, whether for toys or clothing, can be very advantageously provided.

Another structural feature that should be included, if not prohibitive on the score of cost, is a fireplace—for what child does not love the glow of an open fire and all those delectable things that follow in its trail? The joys of "the story-telling hour" twixt the evening meal and bedtime are a hundredfold intensified before a fireplace. And, even in this sophisticated age, there are surely numberless children who can revel in the simple pleasures of roasting marshmallows and popping corn around the nursery hearth. Apart from its sway over the heart and the imagination of childhood, however, the fireplace is always a valuable aid to ventilation in a room used by day as well as by night: and for this reason it is a particularly desirable equipment for the modern nursery.

Because children, as a general rule, are possessed of an almost instinctive predilection for decided pattern and pure color, the treatment of a child's room offers an unusually fertile field for decorative ingenuity. Nevertheless, anything savoring of the bizarre has no legitimate place in the room: for it must ever be borne in mind that tastes are being formed and habits of thought and action largely determined within the four walls of a nursery. That is precisely why, in both its decoration and furnishing, the child's room should be above reproach from the artistic standpoint.

A great, yawning fireplace dominates this century-old playroom, in which the walls above the ivory-painted dado are simply finished in whitewash. Even the time-marked oaken beams are whitewashed, as are the bricks which face the fireplace. The original boxed-in staircase has been retained; the space beneath it now being utilized for a diminutive desk which is amply lighted by the nearby window. The floor, too, is old; its large, flat stones ranging, in color from gray to brown being oddly laid to form distinct stripes at stated intervals. The rag rug repeats the colors of the stonework, with a note of blue strongly sounded here and there.

Raisins are one of the richest of all foods in energy.

That Dainty Bread Lends More Charm to Your Table —and More Nourishment to Your Meals

IT'S the finer touches, now and then, that make the meals delightful and especially remarked in certain homes.

A luscious raisin bread, for instance, breaks monotony and whets new appetite. Many women's tables are famous for no more than little variations such as this.

For there's art, remember, not only in the making but in the choice of foods.

Delicious raisin bread served plain with butter or as a crisp, brown toast!—what else is so enchanting to one who has fine tastes?

The flavor of the raisins permeates the loaf. And there's the incomparable zest of fruit.

Just try a dainty raisin bread occasionally and hear what your family says. Serve it to your luncheon guests. Hear their comments.

Remember, too, that raisin foods supply more nourishment as well as flavor.

For raisins furnish 1560 calories of energizing nutriment per pound in practically predigested form.

Also a rich content of food-iron.

You need but a tiny bit of iron daily yet that need is vital. Raisins will help to insure an adequate amount.

In fact, don't think of raisins as merely delicious natural confections—which they are—but also as a healthful food which should be served with regularity in scores of attractive ways.

Note two tempting recipes in the column to the right. Try one today.

Then mail coupon and we'll send our free book, "Recipes with Raisins," suggesting 98 other luscious raisin foods.

Suggestions for the Thanksgiving Feast

BY FRANCIS M. McNALLY

WITH the various festivals of the year, certain dishes are inseparably associated. The very mention of Thanksgiving brings to our minds, creamy pumpkin pies, sugary doughnuts, crisp new celery, cranberry sauce and abundance of autumn vegetables. In our grandmother's day, roast turkey was an indispensable part of the Thanksgiving dinner; but the high prices of the last few years have made this custom a thing of the past, and most of us must look for the next best. This need not discourage the home-maker of modest pocket book, for with care in selection and preparation, she may serve a Thanksgiving dinner worthy of comparison with any in which the turkey holds his historic place. The following menus are given with the hope that you will find in them suggestions which will help to make the Thanksgiving feast not only a success of to-day; but like the two tablespoons of butter and two tablespoons of flour. Re-heat.

Chicken Pie—Clean and cut up two young fowls or chickens. Put in a stew pan with one-half onion, a sprig of parsley and a bit of bay leaf. Cover with boiling water and cook slowly until tender. Remove the chicken, strain stock, skim off fat and cook until reduced to four cups. Thicken stock with one-third cup flour, diluted with enough cold water to pour easily. Place the chicken in a baking dish, and pour over it the thickened sauce. Season to taste. Cover with pie crust and bake in moderate oven until crust is well risen and browned.

Thanksgiving Salad—One pint cranberries stewed and sweetened, one cup chopped walnuts, one cup celery cut in small pieces, one cup diced apples, juice one-half lemon, juice one-half orange, stiff mayonnaise. Mix the first four

Jacqueline of the Purple Bat

BY WINIFRED SCOTT

IT was all very well, thought Peter, to crash into a very unfriendly tree, wreck a brand-new roadster and find one's self a good ten minutes later some thirty or forty feet from the scene of the accident, but it was an altogether different matter to wake up and discover that one had gone crazy during that ten minutes interval.

"I wonder if I look crazy?" he questioned. "But perhaps I'm not. Perhaps it is another case of a magic button. A bit of Aladdin's lamp, you know,—rubbed itself on the tree, and here I am, transported in an instant from dear old Canada to La Belle France."

He closed his eyes for a moment, opened them again and looked around him. Yes, there was not a doubt about it. He must be in France, though how in the world he got there he did not know.

There in front of him stood a little French inn, so typical of its kind that he would have recognized it at once, even if he had not spent four years "soldiering" in France.

There in the doorway stood the inn-keeper in his big white apron, his round, jolly countenance sobered for a minute with anxiety as he looked over in Peter's direction.

There stood a little French peasant girl, looking the same, dressed the same as every other peasant girl he had ever seen in the little French village where he had spent his various "leaves."

Peter started to laugh, very weakly, for his head ached terribly.

"Wonder if they can speak English? 'Fraid I've forgotten what little French I ever knew."

He sat up and motioned to them.

The Frenchman's face lost its worried expression as he left the doorway of the inn and walked towards Peter, the girl following him.

"Bon-jour, Monsieur," he grinned.

"Bon-jour, yourself," retorted Peter. Then he again smiled foolishly.

"Do you think my name is 'Alf'? And do all my buttons look quite normal?"

Seeing the man's blank look, he explained.

"Alf's Button, you know, old chap! Picture of it! He rubbed the button, and there he was, somewhere he never expected to be!"

A soft chuckle of amusement caused Peter to turn. There was the girl, incidentally the prettiest girl he thought he had ever seen, rocking to and fro with laughter.

She moved in front of the man.

"Jean," she said in French, "I will talk to him."

Then she turned to Peter.

"Monsieur," she spoke this time in English, English as good as Peter's own. "Yes," said Peter hopefully.

"You are indeed welcome to our little inn." Her hand motioned to the quaint, rambling building behind, and for the first time Peter noticed the sign outside it, painted in both French and English—"The Purple Bat."

"Thanks," he grinned. "Are you a product of the magic button too?"

She smiled in answer.

"No, Monsieur." She spoke very softly. "But you are a part of dreams come true."

She turned from him quickly.

"This is my cousin, Jean Leblanc, and my name is Jacqueline. If you will be so good, we will escort you in where you may rest."

With Jean's help Peter struggled to his feet. He advanced a few paces. Then everything went black before him.

THE faint perfume of roses greeted him as he awoke. He put his hand to his head, then began to laugh as memory returned to him.

It was a joke, this, to happen in the twentieth century, and to him, of all people,—Peter Courtland.

He glanced around the room, noticing the extreme cleanliness of it, the little white bed with its snowy linen, and the pink roses looking impudently in the windows at him.

"I am going to investigate this mystery," he decided. "Perhaps Jacqueline will help me out."

His gray eyes grew sober. Jacqueline! Already he was thinking of her! He, who had no right to think of any girl. What could she have meant, he wondered, by "dreams come true"? His dreams were over, all over, every one. Perhaps hers would come true, though. He hoped they would, hoped - - -

His head nodded, his eyes closed, and he was asleep again.

In the next few days all the puzzles were cleared up.

Peter found out that it was not a dream after all, but a reality, and that the little inn, so cosy and homelike, for all its grotesque name, was actually in Canada, tucked away amidst the by-roads of old Quebec.

A Threefold Presentation of Miss Anita Stewart, a First National Star

A special cream for the nightly cleansing

It removes every bit of dirt collected during the day

For the nightly cleansing a cream with just enough oil to cleanse thoroughly and not clog the pores

UNLESS you keep your skin thoroughly clean it becomes dull looking. No matter what you do during the day, dust and fine particles of dirt bore deep into the pores.

Everyone realizes this when she has just come in from a dusty trip, but every day your pores collect much dust and dirt that ordinary washing cannot reach.

To cleanse your skin thoroughly you must use a cream with an oil base. It was only after long experiment that our chemists found just the right amount of oil necessary to remove every particle of dirt from the pores and work out again.

Creams with too much oil will clog the pores. Creams that are too stiff will stretch them. That is why it was so important to develop a cream with just enough oil and no more. This cream is Pond's Cold Cream.

This cream is snowy-white, very light and never has that greasy smell. You know as you touch it with your finger tips that it has just the oiliness your skin will welcome.

Tonight after you have washed with warm water and pure soap, smooth a little Pond's Cold Cream on your face and neck. Let it stay a minute. It will work its way into the pores and out again, bringing all the dirt with it. Wipe it off with a soft cloth. The grime on the cloth will convince you how necessary a thorough cleansing is, and that ordinary washing is not enough.

Smooth out the little lines before they grow deep

Pond's Cold Cream does more than cleanse; it keeps your skin supple and stimulates it. Use this delicate oil cream now to smooth out any little fine lines before they have a chance to fasten themselves and grow deeper.

No one cream, however, can care for your skin completely. As a protection against exposure and a base for powder, you need a cream without any oil—Pond's Vanishing Cream, described in detail in the column to the right.

Use both these creams every day. Neither contains anything that can promote the growth of hair or clog the pores. Buy them in convenient sizes of jars or tubes at any drug or departmental store, at 50 cents each. The Pond's Extract Co., Toronto, Canada.

Another cream to protect against wind and chapping

WIND whips the natural moisture out of an unprotected skin. Cold chaps it. If you do not protect your skin before you go out it protects itself by developing a rough coarse surface. Gradually it toughens.

In winter you must guard against these cold chapping winds. The protection you need is a cream that the skin can absorb completely and that acts as an invisible shield against the drying effect of wind and cold.

The cream to use is Pond's Vanishing Cream. Based on an ingredient famous for its soothing effect, this fragrant, greaseless cream is absorbed the instant you smooth it on your face. It gives your skin a soft, velvety surface, keeps the natural moisture in and affords the best possible protection against wind and cold. Always smooth a little on before you go out.

This cream also freshens your complexion in a moment. If your face looks tired and drawn, a little of this refreshing cream will soothe it instantly; and your skin will look fresh and smooth. It will feel firm and rested. This quality of instant freshening makes Pond's Vanishing Cream indispensable for evening use.

Have you ever noticed that powder put directly on the skin does not stay? To make it stay you must provide a base to which it can cling.

Always use Pond's Vanishing Cream before you powder. The powder goes on evenly, giving your skin a natural transparent look and it will stay on much longer than if you put it directly on your face. The cream never reappears in a shine because it contains not a drop of oil.

Chicken de Luxe—Steam chicken until tender, then stuff with Uxbridge stuffing and brown in oven. Half an hour before removing from oven, lay over chicken two dozen small link sausage, not cut apart, and allow these to become crisp and brown. Serve chickens on platter, not disturbing the sausage, surrounded by rice croquettes garnished with cranberry jelly. To make the dressing, chop together one onion, one potato, two stalks celery, one slice fat salt pork, one-half cup cooked giblets, two cups bread crumbs seasoned to taste. Moisten with broth in which giblets were cooked.

Winter Salad—One and one-half tablespoons gelatine, one-half cup cold water, one-half cup boiling water, one-half cup sugar, one cup orange juice, juice one lemon, one cup finely chopped raw cranberries. Soak gelatine in cold water and then dissolve in the boiling water. Add sugar, fruit juice and cranberries. Pour into individual moulds. When stiff serve on lettuce leaves with cream dressing.

Thanksgiving Ice Cream—Three pints cream, one and one-half cups dried brown bread crumbs, one cup sugar, one-half cup shredded almonds, one-half cup chopped raisins, one-quarter teaspoon salt. Soak the crumbs in cream for fifteen minutes then rub through a sieve. Add the other ingredients and freeze, using eight parts ice to one salt. Pack with four parts ice to one salt.

Have you had a demonstration of the new, easily connected and high-powered air-cleaning Hoover attachments for dustless cleaning?

"Our rugs wear three to five years longer"

In 1912, several Hoovers were purchased to beat, sweep and suction clean the rugs in the Residential Halls at Cornell University, Ithaca, N. Y.

The results were most gratifying. The cleaning was done thoroughly, in much less time, without tiring the operators or scattering unwholesome dust. And the heavy cost of sending rugs to the cleaners was saved.

Today, twenty-nine Hoovers are in daily use.

Over this period of ten years, there has been ample opportunity to observe the effects of Hoover-cleanings upon the life of many rugs. Naturally the rugs are walked upon a great deal, with so many students going and coming.

"Our rugs wear from three to five years longer than formerly," states Mrs. Elizabeth C. Grider, House Director. "This alone has paid for our Hoovers many times over."

"It is my experience that The Hoover, by its beating process, really extracts all the hidden, nap-cutting dirt from the depths of our rugs and so averts much wear on them.

"Furthermore, The Hoover sweeps beautifully—it collects the stubbornest litter in an instant; it brightens colors and even lifts any crushed nap, as well as cleans by air.

"I have yet to see anything that approaches The Hoover in cleaning efficiency, durability, ease of operation or economy."

Satisfied users of The Hoover now number nearly a million. Talk to the Hoover users in your locality; let their endorsements be your guide.

You can easily own a Hoover. On our divided payment plan, 22c a day soon buys one. There are three models, a size for every purse.

Jacqueline of the Purple Bat

As he grew stronger, he explored all the nooks and corners of the place, chatted with Jean, and made shameless love to Jean's wife Antoinette, who was as plump and jovial as Jean himself, and who had the reputation of making the most wonderful pies.

He also discovered as the weeks passed by that few people ever visited the Purple Bat, except those who came by special invitation. It was more a home than an inn, a home in French Canada to make up for the war-ruined one in far-away France.

It was a lazy life, a happy life in Jacqueline's company, and Peter tried to forget the shadow that hung over his life.

They would go for long walks together in the calm October days when the leaves were wondrous colours of reds and golds. And Jacqueline would talk of Home—her France—in the soft, musical voice that made Peter catch his breath, and clench his hands tightly to his sides.

Those were magical days, until Peter himself broke the spell. He was afraid, afraid of the future, afraid of the love he had grown to have for the little woman who tripped so lightly beside him, and curled her tiny hand so confidently in his.

They had been talking of many things that particular day as they walked down beside the little brook that flowed by the inn, and Peter tried to lead the way to the question he had in mind.

"Jacqueline," he said, apropos of nothing, "Why did you call your place such a queer name?"

Jacqueline laughed.

"Ah, Monsieur, for many years, many hundreds of years, there has been a legend in our family that he who should see a purple bat should find happiness and love. So when we came out here, Jean and I, we named our new home, our home so, so, far away from the land of our birth, The Purple Bat, in the hope that it would bring us luck. That is all the reason."

Peter was silent for a few minutes.

"Jacqueline," his voice was low and strained, "Did you ever know, in France, a girl called Jeanne D'Arcy?"

Jacqueline stopped, and put her hand to her heart.

"I did, Peter," she answered. She nearly always called him Peter.

"But why do you ask?"

"Is she still over there?"

Peter was white to the lips.

"No, Peter, I think not. She had a sweetheart-husband, had little Jeanne. She married him in the Great War, and then she lost him."

"Lost him?" Peter's voice was so strained that it sounded unnatural.

"Yes," responded Jacqueline, without noticing his emotion. "He went away, and never came back, and now I hear that she has gone to look for him."

"Look for him?"

"Are you turning into an echo, Peter? You see, he was a Canadian, and she decided to come over to your great Canada to find him. But what do we care, Peter? We are happy, you and I. We're friends, are we not, and we will hope that Jeanne finds her soldier sweetheart, and is as happy with him as I am with you."

She looked very wistful.

"Jacqueline," said Peter hoarsely, "Let us go back. I—I—my head aches, and I have so many things to think over."

"Righto," laughed Jacqueline, "Righto, let's go."

They walked in silence back to the inn. Peter, avoiding everybody, retired to his room, while Jacqueline entered the kitchen, where Jean sat, placidly eating cherries.

He looked at her quizzically as she entered.

"Qu'est-ce que c'est, ma petite?" he enquired. "What is the matter, my little Jacqueline?"

"It is Peter," she answered. "He, he, feels so badly."

Jacqueline of the Purple Bat

"You love him, Jacqueline, this Peter of the magic button?"

Jacqueline smiled as she thought of Peter's remarks on his arrival.

"Love him, Jean! More than all the world!"

"Ah! And does he love you?"

"I know he does."

"Well, it is simple, little One. I shall, as your guardian, ask this young man what his—what do you call them?—intentions are. And then, as these Canadians say, it is up to you, Flower of my Heart."

"Oh, Jean, you will be gentle with him, won't you?"

"Gentle! Humph!" Jean snorted.

Laboriously he got down from the table, and mounted the stairs to Peter's room.

"Come in," came the answer to his knock.

He entered.

"What is the matter, Jean?" asked Peter as he noticed the serious expression that looked so out of place on Jean's jolly face.

"It is a serious matter, little Peter," said Jean, looking up from his five foot eight to Peter's generous six foot one. "It is about Jacqueline."

"Yes," murmured Peter.

"She loves you, Peter, and I, as her only relation out here, have come to ask you if you love her as well. She is the apple of our eye, Antoinette's and mine, and her happiness means more to us than anything else upon this earth."

Peter's white face grew even whiter.

"Love her? Do I love her? Why, Jean, I love her more than I ever imagined man could love!"

"Ah! Then all is well. And you will marry her and be happy for ever."

"But Jean, I can't marry her. I am married already."

An odd little expression found its way into Jean's eyes for a short second. Then it vanished to be replaced by one of blank astonishment.

"Married!"

"Yes, Jean, married! And I have never seen my wife! Would not know her if I did see her!"

"You joke!"

"Would to Heaven I did! Wait, I will tell you how it happened."

"It was in France. I was over there for four years, first with the British, then with the Canadians. It was all right. I didn't mind the business, but they kept mixing things up, and for two years I didn't get a day's leave. I was a little bit fed-up, when, after two whole years of it, I managed to get ten days."

"I spent them all wandering about the country, in and out the little French villages, picking up curios, and altogether having a very peaceful time."

"Then another year passed. No leave again. Don't know what happened. Another chap, same name, seemed to be getting mine as well as his own. Everything seemed to go wrong, and to finish the good old time I was having, a friendly shell landed beside me and just about ended my troubles for ever."

Jean gave a grunt of sympathy.

"I will never forget it, Jean, never! I was in a hospital for months afterwards, and I left it—blind!"

"Blind! Imagine it! I wouldn't go home, although I had been granted sufficient leave to do so. You see, they could not tell whether it was a temporary or a permanent blindness,—it varies in shell-shock. How I suffered! I could see myself, an object of pity to all the folks at home. I knew I could not stand it. So I stayed in France."

"I drifted into a little village,—I did not even know the name of it, and there I met my wife."

"She was so good to me. Her name was Jeanne,—Jeanne D'Arcy. She nursed me and she cheered me up in all my fits of depression. I thought she was the best little pal a man ever had, and I married her."

"It is funny, Jean, but Jacqueline reminded me of her, at first. But Jeanne was quieter, and she could not speak English so well."

"She used to wear a velvet dress, I remember. Blue, she said it was. And she would come up behind me, put her hands over my eyes (that couldn't see, anyway), and whisper in her musical, broken English, 'Peter, Sweetheart-Husband, I love you.'"

"I sound like an ass, Jean, I know. But the love I had for her was not the same as that I have now for Jacqueline. Jacqueline is my dream-woman, the only real love of my life."

"But what happened?" queried Jean.

"I went to Paris to see a specialist about my eyes. He was able to cure them, and in two weeks I was back, to find the village shelled out and Jeanne gone. I searched for her for over a year, without result, then I came back to Canada."

"Jacqueline told me to-day that she had heard that Jeanne was out here now, looking for me."

He looked the picture of misery, sitting there, and Jean could barely suppress a smile.

"My poor Jacqueline!" he began.

"Stop, Jean, stop! Don't torture me!"

* * *

AND in silence Peter sat there. It grew dusk, then dark. The moon came out, soft and yellow, and in the big tree across the brook, a large owl cried eerily. The roses outside the window were dead, but a faint fragrance from them seemed to still linger. The moon disappeared under a silver cloud, the room was dark again. The door behind him opened slowly. Still Peter did not move.

A girl moved quietly across the room, so quietly that Peter did not hear her. She stood beside him and put her hands over his eyes.

"Peter, Sweetheart-Husband, I love you," she murmured.

The soft, throaty voice, the broken English, and, above all, the words themselves, caused Peter to start. He put out his hands to touch her dress. Yes, it was velvet!

"Is it blue?" he muttered hoarsely.

"Yes, blue, Peter."

"Jeanne, it is you then?"

Her hands still over his eyes, she answered.

"Yes, Peter, it is me. I have been waiting here in your, oh, so big Canada, to find you, and now, I am so happy. You love me still, Peter?"

"Jeanne, I—Jeanne, what can I say? I—I—"

With a low chuckle, she withdrew her hands. In the dim light he looked, looked again, and saw—Jacqueline.

"Jacqueline! Jeanne, where is she?"

"More magic button, Peter."

"Don't tease, Jacqueline."

Then he noticed her dress. It was soft, blue velvet.

"Explain, Jacqueline, explain. What is your name? Is it Jacqueline LeBlanc?"

"No, Monsieur," she curtsied.

"Is it Jeanne D'Arcy?"

"No, Monsieur," she curtsied again.

"Then, what is it?"

She stood for a moment, rocking on one foot, and gazing at him thoughtfully. Then with an adorable smile, she answered.

"Please, Monsieur, it is Jacqueline, Jeanne Courtland."

With a bound Peter was out of his chair, and had caught her to him.

"My W I F E!" he cried.

"My husband" came the soft reply.

Downstairs, in the kitchen sat Jean, fast asleep, his plump arm around Antoinette's plump waist.

Across the brook, the owl called again echoing with its "Tuwhoo, tuwhit, tuwhoo," the old, old story of "I love, I love you."

And upstairs, in the big arm-chair, the two lovers looked into each other's eyes and smiled.

How to Shampoo Your Hair Properly

A simple, easy way to make your hair beautiful—keep it soft and silky, bright, fresh-looking and luxuriant.

THE beauty of your hair depends upon the care you give it. Shampooing it properly is always the most important thing.

It is the shampooing which brings out the real life and lustre, natural wave and color, and makes your hair soft, fresh and luxuriant.

When your hair is dry, dull and heavy, lifeless, stiff and gummy, and the strands cling together, and it feels harsh and disagreeable to the touch, it is because your hair has not been shampooed properly.

When your hair has been shampooed properly, and is thoroughly clean, it will be glossy, smooth and bright, delightfully fresh-looking, soft and silky.

While your hair must have frequent and regular washing to keep it beautiful, it cannot stand the harsh effect of ordinary soaps. The free alkali in ordinary soaps soon dries the scalp, makes the hair brittle and ruins it.

That is why discriminating women, everywhere, now use Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This clear, pure and entirely greaseless product cannot possibly injure, and it does not dry the scalp or make the hair brittle, no matter how often you use it.

If you want to see how really beautiful and attractive you can make your hair look, just follow this simple method:

A Simple, Easy Method

FIRST, put two or three teaspoonfuls of Mulsified in a cup or glass with a little warm water. Then wet the hair and scalp with clear warm water. Pour the Mulsified evenly over the hair and rub it thoroughly all over the scalp and throughout the entire length, down to the ends of the hair.

Two or three teaspoonfuls will make an abundance of rich, creamy lather. This should be rubbed in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips, so as to loosen the dandruff and small particles of dust and dirt that stick to the scalp.

After rubbing in the rich, creamy Mulsified lather, rinse the hair and scalp thoroughly—always using clear, fresh, warm water.

Then use another application of Mulsified, again working up a lather and rubbing it in briskly as before.

Use plenty of lather. Rub it in thoroughly and briskly with the finger tips

The final rinsing should leave the hair soft and silky in the water

When thoroughly clean, wet hair fairly squeaks when you pull it through your fingers

When the hair is dry, always give it a good thorough brushing

You can easily tell when the hair is perfectly clean, for it will be soft and silky in the water.

Rinse the Hair Thoroughly

THIS is very important. After the final washing, the hair and scalp should be rinsed in at least two changes of good warm water and followed with a rinsing in cold water.

After a Mulsified shampoo you will find the hair will dry quickly and evenly and have the appearance of being thicker and heavier than it is.

If you want to always be remembered for your beautiful, well-kept hair, make it a rule to set a certain day each week for a Mulsified coconut oil shampoo. This regular weekly shampooing will keep the scalp soft and the hair fine and silky, bright, fresh-looking and fluffy, wavy and easy to manage—and it will be noticed and admired by everyone.

You can get Mulsified at any drug store or toilet goods counter, anywhere in the world. A 4-ounce bottle should last for months. Beware of imitations—be sure you get Mulsified. Look for the name Watkins on the package.

COCOANUT OIL SHAMPOO

EVER so many of the readers of this department have written to ask about the "clay treatment" for the skin and we hope, by this time, many have profited by the information sent. If you will only use the same and afore-said clay every night for a week, I think you will notice a great improvement in the complexion. As a matter of fact, the skin becomes so much affected by the dust of every-day toil or travel that soap and water and even a cleansing cream will not always remove the impurities. Everyone who has been in a hospital knows that there is a great difference between ordinary cleanliness and surgical cleanliness. The power of certain sand or clay to remove dirt has long been known, but it has remained for modern seekers for new forms of skin treatment to capture the clay and put it in tubes and boxes, all for the sake of making more fair the human countenance.

The directions, in the matter of a clay treatment must be strictly observed. Twenty minutes, or half an hour, should be allowed for the clay application to do its cleansing work. Of course, you are a rather curious-looking person while you are "decorated" with the mask of grey; but, in the end, you will emerge much the fairer for the treatment. There is nothing unpleasant about the clay:—merely a close and cleansing pack which is going to prove a true friend to the skin.

IN this extremely contrary world, we find that even our features partake of the general upside-down-ness. For instance, we may consider the wilfulness of the hairs of our head:—which are said to be numbered. There is no season in which we may not expect the hair to take a sudden fancy for falling. In April there may arrive a day when the hair comes out in the proverbial handfuls. This sad state may come upon us in July or October or may even wait until December. There are so many causes affecting the falling of the hair that we hesitate to assign a "sure remedy." A correspondent writes that she has not enjoyed "a decent head of hair" since the flu made a visitation in 1918. Assuredly the flu was to be blamed for a great deal of unpleasantness and it has taken many months for some of us to regain freshness of complexion and thickness of hair.

There is hardly a condition of the hair that may be described as "hopeless." It is true, no doubt, that the longer we leave our falling locks to straggle along and come out at their own sweet will, the harder it will be to restore the hair to health. Procrastination is a thief of time and beauty and almost everything worth having. So, if your hair is coming out in alarming fashion, have the scalp examined and see to it that a good tonic is procured. There should be brisk and firm massage of the scalp every night. Without this exercise, you can hardly hope to restore healthy conditions. The circulation must be well in motion if the hair is to be the bright and shining crown of glory which every Daughter of Eve desires to possess.

THERE is hardly ever a kind word to be said for November. Nearly every Canadian poet has written something about October, and most Canadian artists have put the rich woodland and opalescent mists of that month on canvas. When November comes along,

A fashionable coat of rust-red duvetyn with inset sleeves, the scarf, collar and cuffs trimmed with smoke-grey flying fox in her boisterous fashion, we hardly feel like welcoming her, in either city or country. November means to us grey skies, bitter winds and the truly, "melancholy days." However, we may regard November as the "getting ready month" and so escape too much thought concerning the weather. Christmas is coming—

A Silver Anniversary

BY ELIZABETH BAILEY PRICE

"Our echoes roll from soul to soul
And grow forever and forever."

A MID environment rife in tradition and history, several hundred women assembled on the Stoney Creek battlefield recently, to celebrate the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the "Mother" or first branch of the Women's Institute and to pay generous tribute to the founder, Mrs. Hoodless, of Hamilton.

It was taken overseas to England, by a Canadian woman, Mrs. Alfred Watt M.B.E., and through its medium amazing feats of service were performed by the rural women there during the war. Its echoes have rolled to South Africa—to Belgium, with its Cercles des Fermières.

A NATIONAL PRESIDENT

Miss Carrie Carmichael of New Glasgow, Nova Scotia, is the recently elected president of the National Council of Women on which, of course, the Federated Women's Institutes are represented.

Twenty-five years ago on almost the same spot, Mrs. Hoodless was instrumental in placing the idea of a society, that had for its chief object the making of better homes, before the women of the district.

The outcome was the formation of the first branch of the Women's Institute.

To-day on the occasion of its silver anniversary, so far have those "Echoes rolled from soul to soul, and grown forever and forever" that nearly one hundred thousand women in Canada are grouped together under the name "The Federated Women's Institutes of Canada." This idea has travelled across our Dominion "from sea to sea." It has tions are under way for an International Federation, which will likely be culminated within the next two years.

Mrs. A. E. Walker, a prominent member of the "Mother Institute" has gone to considerable trouble in looking up the historical facts of the organization of the first branch. She says:

"History will ever connect two important events with the fair village of Stoney Creek. These are the battle of Stoney Creek in 1813 and the birth of the Women's Institutes.

"It seems a strange coincidence that both the Farmer's and Women's Institutes

Watch Your Skin

If you play golf, if you partake in any other outdoor sport or if you are just a woman who takes pride in her complexion, you must care for your skin at this time of the year to avoid the injury, which biting winds will cause. Just before you go out, rub Frostilla Fragrant Lotion over your face and arms. Your skin will be protected and kept smooth and charming. Do the same when you come in. It is a pleasant duty, Frostilla Fragrant Lotion is so refreshing and its fragrance is irresistible.

Frostilla FRAGRANT LOTION

As a base for face powder Frostilla Fragrant Lotion is very popular. Smooth it on, rub it in lightly with a soft cloth, then powder. Note how much more natural is the appearance and how long the powder clings.

AFTER SHAVING

Frostilla Fragrant Lotion after shaving stops the smarting and keeps the skin fit. To soften the beard quicker, pour a few drops on the wet, soapy brush and work in with the lather.

"What Kind of Electric Water Heater Shall I Buy?"

THIS question is on the lips of thousands of householders in Canada. The answer is quite simple. A "flat rate" for continuous water heat (giving hot water day and night) has been introduced into a great many municipalities. If your power company can give you this "flat rate," and if your family consists of not more than eight persons, by all means install a Moffat No. 2 Electric Water Heater with flat rate and meter combination. It is the solution of the hot water problem.

This flat rate means that the average family of from 5 to 8 can now have a continuous supply of hot water, with a standing reserve of 30 gallons always on tap, at an average cost of only $2.95 per month where a Moffat No. 2 Electric Water Heater is used.

With one of these splendid Water Heaters you not only have hot water at all hours, but, should a sudden demand arise, you can turn a three-heat switch and in a short time you will have all the hot water you require to meet the extra need at an additional cost at an average of one cent per K. W. hour. (See diagram and explanation at left.)

This is a Moffat No. 2 Electric Water Heater, with switches for flat rate and meter combination.

How Flat Rate System Works

This is the Moffat Heater Element, with flat rate and meter combination. The upper bracket shows that part of the heater which operates under the Flat Rate System. The lower bracket shows the part of heater which goes to work off the meter on the turn of the three-heat switch, when extra supplies of hot water are needed. This is patented. You cannot purchase a flat rate and three-heat combination on any other electric water heater anywhere in America.

If you are in a district where the "flat rate" system is not yet in use, install a No. 2 Moffat Electric Heater and have the three-heat switch adjusted to meet the needs of the family. This gives you hot water whenever you require it, and is really an excellent plan.

Write at once for full particulars regarding Heaters and Electric Ranges, to Moffats Limited, Weston, Ontario.

should have their origin in Wentworth county.

"Several years before there was a women's institute—there was a Farmer's Institute, one of the active workers of the latter being a Mr. Erland Lee, a young progressive farmer of the district.

"In the fall of 1896 Mr. Lee, while attending the Experimental Union held in Guelph heard Mrs. Hoodless, of Hamilton, deliver an address on "Domestic Science and Sewing in our Public Schools." Mr. Lee was so impressed with this address that he invited her to come to Stoney Creek and speak at a joint meeting of men and women held under the auspices of the Farmer's Institute. She did so and advanced the idea that a women's institute, similar to the farmer's would have many benefits and advantages. The chairman then asked the women, how many could come to a meeting at which Mrs. Hoodless, assisted by Mrs. Rorer, would speak again, and decide whether or no they would organize an institute. Thirty-five hands went up immediately. The following Friday, February 19th, 1897, the women met in Squire's Hall. There were awaiting the speaker, 101 women and one man, Mr. Erland Lee, who was made chairman.

"After much discussion, argument, etc., it was decided to organize a Women's Department of Domestic Economy, in affiliation with the Farmer's Institute, and that the name of the new organization be "Women's Department of the Farmer's Institute of South Wentworth." The following officers were elected; president, Mrs. E. D. Smith; first vice-president, Mrs. J. M. Melson; second vice-president, Mrs. J. J. Dean; secretary, Miss M. E. Nash; treasurer, Mrs. J. H. McNeilly. These officers have been continuous active workers ever since.

"The first regular meeting was held Thursday, February 25th, when the name of the Society was discussed and changed to "The Women's Institute of Saltfleet." The constitution and by-laws were drafted and adopted, these remaining to-day almost identical to those passed at that meeting. The constitution read: "The object of this Institute shall be to promote that knowledge of household science which shall lead to the improvement in household architecture with special attention to home sanitation, to a better understanding of the economic and hygienic value of goods and fuels and to a more scientific care of children with a view to raising the general health of our people."

At the next meeting, two weeks later, a reply from Mr. Hodson, superintendent of the Farmer's Institute, was read and was most favorable.

It is interesting to note the topics studied and discussed at the first meetings. Mrs. McNeilly gave a paper on "Proper Food for Children" at the second meeting, followed by a discussion, while another paper on "Art" was read by a member. Other papers were on "Our Children," "The Children in Health and Disease," "Child Culture," "Fresh Air," etc., these showing that even in these early days the institute was blazing a trail along the work of Child Welfare.

The membership for the first year was seventy-five. In the latter part of 1898 the institute exchanged visits with other branches—discussed affiliation with the National Council of Women, held successful concerts, and offered prizes at the township fairs for the best whole wheat bread.

To show how progressive these early members were, it is recorded in the minutes of January 12th, 1899, of sending two members to Welland, to give papers at the Farmer's Institute meeting; also different members were appointed to write articles for the "Weekly Sun of Toronto," the "Farmer's Advocate," of London, and the "Rural New Yorker," of New York City.

At an open meeting in 1899, with Mrs. Hoodless in the chair, an address was given on "Bread and Butter Making."

The Ploughman

BY F. H. SWEET

CHAPPELL'S berry fields presented a busy scene during the picking season. All the girls and boys of the neighborhood, who wanted work, were there—and all the older people, too, for that matter. Little tots of seven and eight, and their great-grandfathers and great-grandmothers of seventy or eighty, were spread out like animated dots over the strawberry fields, or scattered along the rows of currants and gooseberries, or perhaps almost hidden by the tall green sprays of raspberry vines. Every day hundreds of nicely packed crates and baskets and boxes were taken to the railroad station by the delivery wagon; and every evening the small army of pickers crowded about the office door to exchange the cardboard checks representing their day's labor for an equivalent in money.

So one day when a rough, half-grown boy slouched up to the manager and mumbled something about work, he was promptly directed to join the pickers. Work? There was lots of it, the manager said.

But the fellow drew back, his face clouding. Evidently the answer was unexpected. For a single instant they gazed at each other; then the fellow's eyes shifted and dropped, and the manager's darkened. He had met this manner of man—or boy—before, and knew his ways. Asking for work was but a feeler; that being refused, he would tell some pitiful story and beg for his dinner and perhaps a little money, in the meantime looking about with stealthy, covetous eyes for whatever was valuable and portable. Very likely he had associates in the vicinity; and the manager's eyes went down to the main road, and along that towards the bit of woods a quarter of a mile away. Yes, there were two men sprawled upon the grass beside the road, smoking. Even at that distance he could recognize them as tramps. A hard look came into his eyes, and sharp words to his lips. But only for a moment; then they were lost in something entirely different.

And it all came about from his little four-year-old son passing by them toward the berry field. The figure had been slouching away when the shifting eyes caught sight of the boy, and for an instant a new look came into them, and then became lost in the habitual expression of sullenness. But brief as it was, the manager had seen.

John Grover had not been a hirer of help all these years to make mistakes in his men. Besides, he was fond of experimenting. Sometimes the best firewood had the roughest, knottiest bark on the outside; and of all the varieties of strawberries he raised, his own choice was a small, irregular fruit which even a local market would have disdained. This unprepossessing applicant for work might not be as bad as he looked. He was of good figure, evidently strong and healthy, and his very sullenness and lack of confidence were in his favor, for they indicated that he was ashamed of his position. Moreover, he was only a boy and very likely the tool of others. And then that look.

"Yes, I have plenty of work," he said, looking keenly at the lowering, discontented face. "Did you ever pick berries?"

"No," surlily.

The manager's gaze examined him critically, comprehendingly. "And yet you were brought up on a farm," he declared.

The eyes sought his suspiciously. "How do you know?"

The manager laughed. "I haven't dealt with men without learning some of the signs of their vocations," he answered. "Your hands have been hardened and toughened by plough handles. I can see that. And you walk like a farmer. But come," as the other scowled and glanced toward the road, "let us go down to the berry fields."

"But I don't want—" the sentence was cut short abruptly. He had asked for work, and it would not do to arouse suspicion. That was not what he was here for.

"I don't b'lieve I can pick berries," he grumbled as he slouched along beside the manager, "my fingers are too big."

"Oh, well, there's plenty of other work," the manager said easily. "And to tell the truth, it's the other work that I am anxious about. Anybody can pick berries. Now this," as they paused beside the strawberry field, "is our banner crop. We have forty varieties and a daily yield of fifty to seventy-five bushels. Taste that," stooping and selecting a large, thickly-crowned berry, "it's a buback, and in just the right condition for eating."

The hulking, over-grown boy took the berry diffidently and placed it between his teeth. "Yes, it's good," he said after a moment, "prime good."

"Our market thinks so. Now we'll go on to the currants and raspberries and blackberries. Then there is a field I want to show you. But about work, it's curious how many people there are who haven't learned their own business. The country's full of farmers, for instance, and yet there are very few who can plough a field of heavy ground properly. I've a dozen men here who think they can handle a plough, but there's only two or three of them I'd trust with really fine work. You know how it is, though, being raised on a farm."

The Ploughman

The heavy face lightened for an instant. "Yes, good ploughers are scarce. I used to—"

The sentence was not finished, but the manager looked across the fields to hide a sudden twinkle of satisfaction in his eyes. It was the first sign of interest the tramp had shown.

* * *

FROM the berry fields they went across some meadow land and a brook to a square, inclosed field of ten or twelve acres. Around it several furrows had recently been turned, for the soil was still moist. The manager nodded toward them significantly.

"I want you to look that work over," he said, "and tell me just what you think of it." He then appeared to busy himself about the fence, but did it in such a manner as to keep a covert oversight of his companion's face.

But the caution was unnecessary. The heavy face was animated, critical, disapproving; and the hulking figure had straightened up and seemingly grown more compact as it moved back and forth along the furrows. Evidently the fellow was with something familiar and congenial, and lost to the restraint of his presence.

"Well," the manager asked at last, "what do you think?"

The fellow started and resumed his slouching gait. "Botch work," he replied, "every furrer of it; an' the furrers are all done by different hands, too."

"Right you are," cried the manager, heartily. "You've got keen eyes. The way of it is this; yesterday a man came who said he could plough. I set him to work here and let him go round once, then put him to picking strawberries. This morning two other men came, and I gave each of them a chance at the plough. They are now with the pickers. This field ought to have been ready for plants ten days ago, but I want it ploughed right or not at all." He looked at the face before him a moment, then appeared to decide its owner was not ready for overtures, for he went on: "My experts will likely have to come over and do the work, though I hate to spare them from the job they're at now. It's curious how many there are like you who know good work when they see it, but who can't do it themselves. I don't doubt but every man on the place really believes he is a good plougher."

"Huh! I could do that lot with any man in the country," he heard his companion mutter, but appeared not to notice.

"Now that you've seen poor work," he continued regretfully, "I really wish one of my experts was here to show you what good ploughing was like. I wish all the farmers in the country could come and take a lesson."

The hulking figure had been hitching about impatiently. Now it turned to him defiantly. "Have ye any horses handy?"

"Why, yes, I believe so," the manager replied with apparent indifference. "I wouldn't wonder if there is a pair all harnessed, just as the man left them. I'll have them brought."

A boy was at work near the brook. He called to him. The boy sped away toward the barn. When he appeared with the horses, five minutes later, the tramp caught the lines from him with dexterous familiarity, guided the horses through the opening in the fence, fastened the traces to the plough, swung it over into another furrow, and then chirruped quickly to the horses. They, with a recognizing backward glance at the authority in the voice, moved forward into steady, uniform work. The manager watched with approval.

As he completed the round and approached the opening in the fence, the manager looked for him to leave the field. But no! he kept right on, apparently oblivious of everything but his work. To the manager, he seemed like one who had returned to a favorite occupation after a long absence; and, absorbed in it, was unconscious of aught else. He watched them for another ten minutes, then went to the berry fields. It was noon when he returned.

"Hello!" he called, cheerily, "it's about time for something to eat. We'll take the horses to the barn, and then get our dinner."

The tramp started and passed his hand across his forehead. "Why, I didn't know it was so late," he ejaculated. "I must be goin'." I—I—I've got some friends waiting."

"But you must have dinner first," the manager insisted.

"No, no, I can't wait for that. I'll look after the horses first, an' then go. No, you needn't take 'em," as the manager laid his hand upon the reins. "I'll do it this time. I like horses."

The manager smiled as he walked behind him to the barn and waited for him to feed the horses. Evidently this was the avenue to the fellow's heart.

"Now come upstairs with me a minute," he said, as they left the stable.

The fellow hesitated, then followed. Over the stable was a long room, lighted by two windows, and containing a bed, washstand and several chairs. It looked wholesome and inviting. The manager pointed to the bed.

"Sit down," he said quietly, "I want to talk to you. No, there is no hurry, as the other seemed about to refuse. Your companions have gone. I went to them and said you were at work, and that they could have ten minutes to leave my premises. They will not return," grimly. "No, you cannot go yet," blockading the stairway, "and you need not look so fierce. I am doing it for your good."

He waited until the boy had seated himself upon the bed, scowling and sullen, and with an ill-concealed expression of anxiety on his face. Then he went on, more gently.

"Let me tell you something now, my boy. These men have a hold upon you, and you are afraid of them. They sent you in here to look around, and were waiting for you to come back and report. But you needn't fear. I talked pretty plain, and they won't dare to cross my land again. You can have this room, and charge of the horses downstairs, and I will give you steady work. Unless you wish, there will be no need for you to leave the place for a year to come. I have a boarding house on the farm where most of the men stay, but I think you will like this room to yourself and near the horses the best. No," as the other's face began to work curiously, "you needn't tell me anything yet. I am willing to trust you. I am not generally mistaken in men. Will you stay?"

The hulking figure straightened as it had done while criticising the furrows. Then it rose heavily and came forward.

"Yes, sir, I'll stay," the fellow said huskily, "an—an' thank you, too."

by Miss Laura Rose, of the O.A.C. Guelph, now Mrs. Stephen, of Huntingdon. She was the first woman government speaker to address the institute, and at the present time is one of the best known and most popular speakers.

A review of the work on down the years shows that in 1900 the W. I. was taking more interest in community work; in 1901 a demonstration lesson in First Aid; in 1902 a committee with Mrs. Hoodless as convener was chosen to select a motto, also a suitable pin. The motto "For Home and Country" was chosen, this being the one submitted by Mrs. Laura Rose Stephen. It is an interesting fact to know that to-day the official paper of the British Institutes is called "Home and Country."

For several years the W. I. was carried on in much the same way. Gradually more and more help was received from the Department of Agriculture, and grants came annually. Speakers were sent regularly in June and midwinter demonstration courses in dressmaking, home nursing, etc., were provided.

At this time the founder, who had always been the honorary president, Mrs. Hoodless, passed away, and all felt her loss keenly. In 1910, the Stoney Creek Institute expressed a wish to recognize in some official way the services of Mrs. Hoodless, and it was decided to place a life-sized photograph in Macdonald Hall at Guelph. Mrs. Horning, then the district president, made the appeal at the annual convention, and in the fall of 1911 the wonderful portrait painted by Mr. Forster of Toronto was unveiled with fitting ceremony.

The outbreak of war found a band of organized workers and in less than three weeks from the time the war broke out, and during the entire period the members worked unceasingly. They adopted every conceivable and legitimate way of raising money, and contributed hundreds of dollars of cash to every cause in favor of the Allies.

At the recent occasion the presence of Mr. Erland Lee was a matter of pleasure and interest. Mr. Lee, who was chairman for the afternoon ceremony, paid tributes to some of the pioneer Institute workers, saying:

"There was Mrs. Adelaide Hoodless, who put it into the minds of the men to have women's institutes—a woman who had heard criticism that she was neglecting her own home in order to bring service to other homes.

"There was Mrs. R. D. Smith, the first president, who had never said a word in public in her life, but she united the first group of women into a harmonious organization.

"There was Mrs. McNeilly, the first treasurer, who gave most valuable service carrying the work from the old to the modern stages."

There were also the services of Mr. Hodgson, Dr. Creelman and later Mr. George Putnam in directing the institute service through the Department of Agriculture, and also the first woman speaker, Mrs. Laura Rose Stephen.

Mrs. W. Todd, president of the Federated Women's Institutes of Canada, spoke briefly, stating that while much had been achieved there was still much to do to make the lot of the farm woman a happier one, especially in parts of Northern Ontario.

Other speakers were Mr. W. A. Crockett, M.P.P. for Wentworth; Mrs. Adam Inch, Mount Hamilton; Mrs. Edwards, President provincial federation; Mrs. Alexander, of Glanford, who read a paper on the life of Mrs. Hoodless; Mrs. J. B. Campbell, of Burlington, who presented a silver basket filled with roses, to which Mrs. Felker responded. On motion of Mrs. C. E. Horning, a standing vote of reverence was accorded the memory of Mrs. Hoodless. Greetings were received from Miss Helen MacDougall, of Nova Scotia.

"The Awakening"

Competitive Music Festivals

Idea now being extended from the Canadian West to Eastern Canada and the United States

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

ONE of the notable signs of the times during the present year has been the extension of the Competitive Festival idea in connection with music to the older and more conservative communities. During the past five years I have frequently written in these columns of the whole-hearted vigor with which the three prairie provinces of Canada, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, have thrown themselves into the movement; and of the splendid results which have been achieved. Indeed it is a matter of amazement to Canadians from the East to learn how truly musical the Western provinces have become within comparatively few years. It is perhaps an indication of the growing tide of Western influence in Canada, that taking inspiration directly from the prairies, Ontario musical interests are at present engaged in organizing a festival for next year to embrace all the vast settled territory which that province covers. When one comes to think of it, the work to be done is colossal in scope, since it aims to cover towns and cities as scattered in geographical location as Ottawa in the East, Cochrane in the North, Fort William in the West, and Windsor and Toronto in the South. It will, perhaps be difficult at the outset to interest the whole of this vast territory, but a start has been made; and the general committee is looking to results ten years hence rather than immediate.

In stating that the inspiration for this attempt comes directly from the West, I am uttering no empty compliment. At the preliminary organization meetings last spring, Dr. A. S. Vogt, Dr. Albert Ham and other Eastern musicians who have acted as judges at the Western festivals emphatically pointed to the success of the latter and suggested them as models on which Ontario could frame its plans. Thus the East already owes a debt to the West in the matter of example and experience, that enables them to make short cuts in the intricate work of preparation. Already excellent beginnings have been made with musical competitions at the Canadian National Exhibition, organized by the Canadian Bureau for the Advancement of Music, whose members, largely composed of representatives of the musical trades have realized the stimulus to business and to the music in the home movement which has been created by the festivals of the prairie provinces. Moreover it is notable that since the Canadian West went in for festival competitions, the idea has made rapid progress in the United States. Quite recently a competitive festival was held at Buffalo under the auspices of the American National Musical Association, and it was quite obvious that in its syllabus it had largely been guided by our prairie festivals, even in the matter of appointing judges, for the same adjudicators of choral competitions who served in Manitoba and Alberta last spring, Dr. T. Tertius Noble of New York and Dr. A. S. Vogt of Toronto, were appointed to act in a similar capacity at the American Festival.

It is the hope of those interested in the movement that since it will next year embrace all the provinces between Montreal and the Rocky Mountains, at no distant day we shall see festivals covering the territorial spread from the Atlantic to the Pacific. It should of course be realized that such affairs are not a new world idea, but have long held favor in the motherland and in certain countries of Europe. Last spring when the preliminaries for the Ontario Festival of 1923 were first under discussion, two Scotsmen, prominent in the work of inculcating music in the public schools, Mr. A. T. Cringan, of the Ontario Department of Education, and Mr. D. A. Mackenzie, Supervisor of Music for the Toronto Board of Education, both boasted of having been the products of Scottish Festival competitions. Mr. Cringan's reminiscences were especially interesting for he told of winning a prize in his native land for tenor singing at such a festival, at the same time as another young lad won a prize for comic singing,—the latter being no other than the world famous Harry Lauder. This was forty years ago; and it was the first intimation most of us had received that Sir Harry's earliest reach for fame was at a Festival competition.

THE immense vogue of the Scottish festivals has continued and recently elicited comment from many journals. This year the climax of the movement in Scotland was reached when the Glasgow Festival extended over a period of ten days, while the competitions at the near-by Edinburgh Festival lasted eight days,—as they have done for two or three years back. As "Musical Opinion" has pointed out, the historic competition of the Mastersingers of Nuremburg would appear to have been a very circumscribed and parochial affair in comparison with the larger Scottish festivals, and an adjudicator of the type of Beckmesser who in Wagner's opera spurned Walther's Prize Song would not now be tolerated. The same publication is disposed to think that while romance has cast a glamor around the musical competitions of the middle ages they were not to be compared in actual musical interest with those of to-day.

In Scotland, it is said, the spontaneous spirit of human interest is as vigorous as similar outpourings at sporting events. And I am told that in our own West keen local enthusiasm which gives backing to the home choir or the home soloist has developed. But I trust, that in connection with our Canadian festivals enthusiasm will never go to the length of "roasting the umpires," as is apt to happen in connection with sporting events. In the main it would seem that in time interest in musical competitions should be as keen in the sporting sense as in the case of intercollegiate football. In a sporting event, you have only an odd dozen or so of champions to cheer for; but in a large choral competition you have hundreds of your fellow townfolk to urge on to victory. At Glasgow this year there were no less than eleven thousand active participants or competitors, including the aggregate of choristers involved in addition to the solo entries. This of course is an unprecedented figure but the totals in our Canadian Festivals run high and will increase in the future.

Let us consider what all this means, going back from the mass to the individual. In connection with the Glasgow event it meant musical practice for love of it in nearly eleven thousand homes, though there were no doubt cases where whole families were participants. The nature of this practice involves the whole range of music, sight reading for choral work, solo singing, piano, violin and many other varieties of instrumental music-making.

It is thus that the festival competition spreads music into the homes of entire communities. Moreover when outsiders become interested from motives of local patriotism they naturally begin to pick up points about music. If you go to a foot-ball match or a base-ball match as a novice, you are invariably astonished at the myriad of well-informed critics, young and old, of the technique of the game; who have picked up their knowledge from observation stimulated by sporting interest. Now something like this is bound to happen when musical competitions take a permanent hold on a community. I think that nearly every music critic will admit that he has acquired his gift, however meagre it may be, more from listening than from the foundation studies which were his starting point. When whole communities are induced to pay critical attention because of the sporting chances involved then will they be on the road to become truly musical.

An English writer dealing with the secondary influences of the musical competition once it gets a real grip on the people holds that "the more accomplished and ambitious competitors secure their real reward in the judicial comments of the adjudicators; while the less accomplished receive even greater reward, not only in the constructive criticism of the adjudicators, but in the invaluable opportunity of hearing their more experienced and gifted colleagues realize more completely the aims for which they have been striving." Of course this all depends on the ability of participants to "play the game" in the old British sense of that phrase. The lives of judges would be made unbearable if they were to be the subject of modified outbreaks of the same spirit that prompts baseball "fans" to throw bottles after an unpopular decision and sporting reporters to write "The umpire was rotten." A full realization of the real cultural purpose of competitions; and a willingness to carefully think over the decisions of adjudicators even when they seem unfair; are essential if they are to perform their mission and be made really as inspirational and educational as enthusiasts desire.

Odds and Ends

WE hear a great deal about "the psychology" of this, that and the other. The psychology of color is a favorite topic for the psychologist as well as the interior decorator, for it is recognized that cheer and content—such essential home virtues—are very largely influenced by pleasant color combinations, says Marion Brownfield.

On the table the effect of color has doubtless an influence upon the appetite. Not only serving foods daintily in dishes that set it off to best advantage encourages appetite and good digestion, but, stimulates jaded palates. Change from sheer monotony indeed is what makes other people's cooking—no better than ours—taste good. Different tableware, too, makes food seem to have a different flavor. So variety of dishes, used for a change with the same recipe, makes a difference that is unconsciously transferred to the enjoyment of the good itself. For this reason a little study in serving foods in dishes that by color-contrast or harmony, set them off, really pays the thoughtful housewife.

Some suggestions for different foods in dishes of different colors follow. Blue dishes, of which every household is pretty sure to have some, set off particularly anything yellow in hue. Thus oranges, apples, (yellow or red), eggs, Hubbard squash and such yellow foods as cornbread, cornstarch pudding and custards all look delightful in blue dishes. Red foods also look well, but have more contrast with green ware, so will be spoken of farther along.

White dishes with gold bands have a pleasing delicacy and are therefore suitable for dainty effects. Crisp blanched lettuce, water cress, pineapple and watermelon are appetizing served in them. Foods of strong flavor sometimes need a simple background, also. Onions, fish and wieners, for this reason, may be palatable in these dishes.

Yellow dishes which may be banded, flowered or plain, offer a great opportunity for a cheerful effect. Foods that have no great charm of color themselves look well in yellow. Thus a steak, chops or hash gain a certain richness in these dishes. Macaroni, a colorless food, unless combined with tomato, gains character in a yellow dish. Chocolate recipes make an effective contrast, also, while purple foods such as grapes, blackberries and plums, either fresh or in sauce, go effectively in yellow dishes.

Red foods contrast strikingly in green dishes of which there are many designs. Banded, flowered or the delicately solid pale green Seiji ware are a few of the artistic varieties of green ware. Beets, salmon, strawberries, raspberries, cherries, gelatines, desserts, frosted cakes and ice cream look invitingly cool in green for summer service.

Pink dishes should be reserved for white foods. Among these are cereals of all kinds, mashed or riced potatoes, white cakes, plain or frosted, vanilla ice cream and white desserts such as rice Rebecca, pudding, junket and so forth.

Red dishes of Japanese design may effectively hold green foods such as green peppers, cucumbers, string beans, peas. They also add character to colorless foods. And strawberries make a pleasing all-red effect in them that seems to add lusciousness to the berries.

The very colorful dishes, of which every one has a few, are often just the thing to make certain foods tempting. Chocolate, lemon gelatine and white foods should be tried in these dishes for pleasure.

THANKS to the good manners long ago inculcated by Confucius, his countrymen still possess the large forbearance which is the only infallible test of the genuineness of a civilization. Even when there is a fair and villagers from miles around flock into the town with their produce, when wheelbarrows get jammed up with carts, and carts with mules, donkeys and pedlars, and the traffic gets apparently hopelessly knotted up in the congested street, there is no such explosion of vituperative wrath as much milder collisions engender elsewhere. Also, owing to those untamed roads, which persistently discourage speed, that element of hurry which we moderns, mistaking it for substantial energy, actually praise as a virtue, is entirely lacking, and the impatience it engenders in our mind, the irascibility it breeds in our manners are happily lacking also. Wherefore these fairs, for all the crowding and squashing and the quantity and pungency of their odors, are a pleasing experience, relates A. E. Grantham in "Asia Magazine."

The goods are spread out on rough stalls or even merely on the ground, where the remnants of a pavement or the steps of a disused temple provide a suitable space. But even there, in such extreme simplicity, they are arranged with an elegance, an instinctive feeling for symmetry which newer countries only associate with unlimited luxury. Peanuts, the cheapest of all fruits, are set out in equidistant, compact little heaps; common crockery is shown off with due regard to the niceties of shape and glaze; rough tools are displayed with a precision worthy of

During her tour of the West with His Excellency, Lady Byng was the guest of Mrs. J. J. Ross, a former war nurse, and wife of a soldier settler, on a farm near Saskatoon. How much extra money do you want to earn in your spare time?

Would you like to have a pleasant home occupation which would enable you to earn money in your spare time? An occupation that has proven successful for women and men, too, all over the country. An occupation at which others have earned all the way from $1.00 a week to $25.00 or even more a week, depending upon the time devoted to the work and the individual ability of the worker.

THE wife and mother of today carries a tremendous burden in trying to make both ends meet — to stretch out her husband's salary so as to pay the rent, the butcher, baker, insurance, heating and lighting bills, keep the children and herself looking respectable, and to enjoy an occasional little outing.

It is a very trying problem—and the wonder is where a woman ever gains the experience and patience to handle the finance of the home as efficiently and economically as she does.

Many women are searching for something to do at home through which they can earn money during spare minutes or a few idle hours. Something that they can pick up and lay down at will, yet be sure of getting a money return for the time they devote to the work. Such work must not be unduly laborious, or of a mental type, but must be work that can be easily handled and in line with her training and natural aptitude for making things to wear.

A great number of women have found this type of home work in knitting socks on the Auto Knitter. In fact, this year the Auto Knitter Company will pay for over 150,000 pairs of socks, made in Canadian homes during spare time by women who own Auto Knitter Machines. And they will pay to these knitters in wages a total of more than $18,000 in payment for their work.

These socks made by Auto Knitter home workers, are known and sold under the name of Olde Tyme Wool Socks. They are retailed in the stores of over 1,000 dealers in Canada. They are advertised in national magazines and newspapers, and so popular have these socks become that the sales are increasing rapidly as well as the number of dealers handling them. The earnings of these home workers vary with the amount of time devoted to the work and the speed of the individual operator, but whether the amount earned be large or small, it is most welcome and helps to make the lives of these workers easier and happier.

Mrs. A. M. Scott, of British Columbia, recently wrote to us saying:

"I received my machine four months ago and I am only sorry I did not get it four years ago, as in four months (only working in my spare time and not interfering in the least with my housework or care of family) I have made over $110.00, besides paying for the machine and keeping my boys so comfortable in nice warm socks and stockings. I used to worry such a lot and wonder how we were going to make ends meet, but now I feel the problem is solved, as I am sure that when I have done so well in the past four months I will do much more in the future."

Auto Knitter spare time home workers are always sure of selling every pair of standard socks because we give a five-year contract to every owner of an Auto Knitter which definitely binds us to receive hosiery and pay a stated price for every dozen pairs made to our standard on the Auto Knitter and sent to us. As a matter of fact, out of the thousands of pairs of socks that are sent to us, less than 5% of the number received are rejected. Besides the price paid for the work we also replace pound for pound the yarn used in the standard socks which you send to us under our work contract. This contract which we give, is absolutely binding on this company to receive for acceptance either large or small lots of standard socks from our workers, and to pay a fixed wage, which you know in advance, for them. Yet the workers themselves are not bound by this contract to us in any way whatsoever.

Auto Knitter Helped Daughters through Normal School

Mrs. G. Geldof, of Manitoba, recently wrote us, in part:

"I must tell you what the Auto Knitter has done for the family, although I can work only six hours a day and that only in winter time. My Auto Knitter helped to keep my eldest daughter in boarding school. It got her the new clothes she needed and provided her with spending money. During the winter the Auto Knitter procured the household supplies. I desired that my youngest daughter should also study the teaching profession, so she went to the same school as her sister. And so we were able to keep the girls in school. My daughter is now a professional teacher and her sister will be teaching also after the next summer holidays. A year ago my husband bought a car in an auction sale. It needed a pair of new tires and we wanted a barrel of gasoline. Again the Auto Knitter came to our aid. With the proceeds of a month's work we were able to get the tires and gasoline. And lastly, the Auto Knitter has kept us busily happy all winter and made me forget the dreariness of this country."

All of the Amazing Truth Cannot Be Told

It is a fact that the amount of earnings reported to us by some of our workers with the Auto Knitter are surprisingly large. If we were to show you many of the letters written to us by Auto Knitter workers, you would hardly believe what you read with your own eyes. Large amounts are earned by many Knitters whom we prefer to class as exceptional, but a much larger number of workers earn more modest sums which they find worth while and helpful.

But, back of these gratifying spare-time earnings lies the simple fact that the people worked. If you want to keep your house in order you must work.

If you want to make your own clothes you must work. Nothing ever does work of itself. And the Auto Knitter is no exception. The more time that you work at it, the more adept you become and naturally, the more socks you will produce. You could have an Auto Knitter in your home for a year, but if you don't operate it, you wouldn't make one cent out of it. That's common sense, isn't it? The Auto Knitter is for workers and in the hands of such, it will answer every demand made upon it for reliability, speed and earning capacity.

And whether such people can turn out a dozen standard pairs of socks a week or ten or more dozen we will gladly pay for every pair of standard socks that they send us.

How You Can Make Money At Home

Clearly and briefly, here is our proposition: The Auto Knitter Hosiery Company enters into a five-year agreement to buy all of the standard socks you knit on the Auto Knitter and send in to them, paying a fixed guaranteed price. Checks will be sent promptly for each lot, large or small. Replacement yarn is also sent you pound for pound for that used in the socks you send to us. Previous experience in hand-knitting is not necessary, as full directions for operating the machine are contained in the instruction book sent with every Auto Knitter. The Auto Knitter comes with a sock already started in it and its operation is not difficult, but like your sewing machine there is a right way and a wrong way to operate it, and your first sock may not be a perfect one, just as the first work you did on your sewing machine was not perfect. The fact that there are women and men all over the country who are making money at Auto Knitting, and who learned to use their machines without assistance other than their instruction book shows that the operation of the Auto Knitter can be accomplished by average women and men.

Competitive Music Festivals

It is said that in Scotland, while there is plenty of the sporting spirit which desires that "The home team" win, both competitors and audiences are realizing that competitions supported in the proper spirit produce higher standards of performance and more discriminating appreciation on the part of audiences.

While the work of adjudicators carries with it a certain zest of interest and enjoyment; they unquestionably labor under grave difficulties. Often a competing body which has ignored or gone as far as possible in trying to get outside the conditions of a contest will win favor with an audience, or perhaps have its organized "boosters." The judges are thus compelled to flout friendly opinion and face criticism. I would advise all individuals and all corporate bodies entering a given class in a festival competition to very carefully consider what is required of them; and to remember that the only way judges can arrive at a decision is by estimating points,—so many points for tonal quality; so many for correctness of pitch; so many for clarity of enunciation; so many for shading and refinement of diction; so many for expression and attack; so many (in choral bodies) for balance of vocal sections.

Now it is quite possible for a chorus to be superb in vocal quality and yet fail to make a decent showing in the many other elements that go to good interpretative singing. The general custom prevailing at Canadian festivals of a statement by the judges of the reasons for their decisions is one of the highest value; even though it does at times produce surprises.

There is one fine quality that most professional musicians, even those with bad dispositions, usually possess; and that is a willingness to encourage sincere artistic endeavor, even when they are compelled in their findings to lay bare basic and detrimental faults. No wise adjudicator can afford to countenance faults of exaggeration and other inartistic tendencies merely because a chorus has a magnetic and well-energized attack, which on occasions of this kind is apt to captivate audiences. In British competitions judges are apt to favor intelligence of direction; the patience and ability of the choral conductor who manages to produce a sincere artistic effect though embarrassed by inferior material. It is easy for the experienced adjudicator to discern those competitors, whose contributions whether in the solo or ensemble competitions reveal most careful and intelligent preparatory work; most conscientious attention to the full requirements of the occasion. The conductor who with an inferior personnel makes a good showing, must ever receive more sympathetic attention than the man who has a great wealth of voices that have in reality required little patient training. In fact, I have sometimes thought that a system of handicaps in the same spirit as that which prevails in the better order of racing, would not be inadvisable.

In a musical journal I recently ran across an illustration which put the matter very neatly. Many years ago a leading Scottish educationist pointed out that it was one of the ironies of the teaching profession that pupils who cost the least trouble bring the most credit to the teacher, and those who cost most pains the least recognition. "Throughout my long career" he said "my hardest work and my best work has been spent on the dunces, and the public know nothing of it."

The truly efficient musical adjudicator will discern the evidences of the amount of hard and sympathetic work that has been bestowed on the task of preparation and publicly voice appreciation, even in cases where it is not possible to award a prize.

The publication of "The Wood Carver's Wife and Later Poems" by Marjorie L. C. Pickthall has a literary interest for all lovers of poetry and a deep personal appeal to those who knew the writer. The death of Miss Pickthall in Vancouver last April seemed to cut short a career which promised eminent achievement. However, the work that has been done is so delicate and rare in craftsmanship that the world may, indeed, be grateful for this writer's gift of song. "The Wood Carver's Wife" is a poem, dramatic in form, which first appeared in "The University Magazine," and is a tragic story of the havoc wrought by a love such as Guinevere bestowed on Lancelot. There are magical lines through the scenes of swift-marching tragedy, but the production is not a play, as the histrionic world regards it. The other poems in the volume are the work of an artist whose striving is ever for the ideal. The beauty of many songs is so poignant as to be near supreme sorrow. There are other lays which "sing themselves" as their rhythm flows along. Such is the lilting strain of these gypsy verses:

"When I was a tall lad with money in my hand,
I'd pots and pans a plenty and friends about the land.
I'd golden roads in sunshine and silver roads in rain,
And a little grey donkey and a girl out of Spain.
Now I am an old man with rings in my ears,
All too sad for laughter, all too wise for tears.
And the Spanish girl has left me, and the money's coming slow,
And the little grey donkey was lamed long ago.
When I get to heaven where tinkers may be seen,
I'll wear a yellow kerchief and a coat of velveteen,
And out beyond the shining streets I'll take the road again
With a little grey donkey and a girl out of Spain.

This is a volume of grace and loveliness, which will be read many times by those who believe that poetry should never be less than beautiful. The foreword by Isabel Ecclestone Mackay is a fitting and tender tribute to one whose life and genius will always be to those who knew her a gleam of what is higher. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $1.50)

"D'Arcy Conyers" by Bertal Heeney is the story of a young Canadian, who was brought up simply in a country home on the banks of the Gatineau, went to the City of Montreal to enter business life and fell into evil ways, finally committing theft. He escaped any legal penalty and found his way to a farm near Barrie, where he redeemed the promise of his early years. The writer has no pretensions to literary distinction, and his story is reminiscent of the old-time Sunday School book. (Published in Toronto by Hodder and Stoughton. Price, $1.75)

"Huntingtower" by John Buchan, is an after-the-war story, full of such adventure as made his former tales, "Greenmantle" and "Thirty-Nine Steps" books to be remembered. Mr. Dickson McCunn, a retired provision merchant, fifty-five years of age, but incorrigibly young, sets out on a walking tour in search of adventure, and meets an ex-soldier, Mr. John Heritage, a socialist of an amateur type, a writer of execrable free verse and a romantic youth at heart. They discover that a Russian princess is imprisoned in an old tower and they forthwith become her champions. In their exploits, they are greatly aided by Gorbals "Die Hards," a band of boy scouts from the slums of Glasgow. They are marvellous creatures, indeed, super scouts who accomplish deeds of daring which the crusaders might envy. "Huntingtower" is warranted to keep you awake: and you will certainly wish to know more about Saskia. (Published in Toronto by Hodder and Stoughton, Ltd. Price, $1.75)

"Ann and Her Mother," by O. Douglas, is a volume of reminiscences, as fresh as a breeze from hillside heather. The mother is the widow of a Scottish minister and she talks with Ann, of the people they have known in the course of the years, in such a fashion that we know them all and feel utterly at home with Mrs. Daw, who "liked the kind o' minister that misca's the devil for about twenty meenits and then stops," and Mrs. Dewar who, when the servants worried her, walked about saying the hymn beginning, "Calm me, O God, and keep me calm." (Published in Toronto by Hodder and Stoughton Ltd., Price $1.75)

"The Tides of Deal" by Latta Griswold is a story of a boys' school in New England. The school is different from an English school and is not the same in institutions as our own Canadian schools, such as Trinity College School at Port Hope. The boys, however, are entirely "like other boys" and we have an interesting tale of school-boy ambition and sport. The hero of the story is Jeffrey Maine, who is altogether a "decent sort" who sacrifices school honors in the end, that he may save another from disgrace. You meet a frank, jolly and entertaining crowd of boys in the narrative and would be willing to hear more of them. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto. Price, $1.75)

"The Black Candle," is an exposé by Mrs. Arthur Murphy of the "drug" traffic in Canada. Mrs. Murphy, as Police Magistrate in the City of Edmonton, has had an excellent opportunity for acquainting herself with the facts of the case, so far as the law has been able to reveal them. The subject has been handled thoroughly and fearlessly; but, black as conditions are, in connection with the traffic in narcotics, Mrs. Murphy gives a gleam of hope for those who are sincerely anxious to regain "themselves." The volume is one which sets forth the facts in a traffic which is absolutely evil and the writer would impress on every citizen the gravity of the situation and the necessity for meeting the dangers described in "The Black Candle." (Published in Toronto by Thomas Allen, Price, $2.00)

"Helga and the White Peacock" is a delightful play in three acts for young people by Cornelia Meigs. The tale underlying is the old-time story of a witch-like woman—in this case, a "Spider Woman"—who catches Helga in her web: and of course there is a gallant young knight to the rescue. (Published in Toronto by the Macmillan Company. Price, $1.00)

"The Drama of Life," by Thomas H. Mitchell, is a series of reflections upon Shakespeare's "Seven Ages," highly edifying and stimulating in their effect upon the reader. There is a wholesome optimism throughout the addresses which makes them welcome reading in an age which knows much that is depressing:—nor is it the easy optimism of Dr. Frank Crane, but the vision of one who has learned "to see life steadily and see it whole." (Published by Thomas Allen, Toronto. Price, $0.00)

Westclox

Pedigreed Clocks

THE name of a champion in the pedigree of an animal pretty nearly settles the question of its value.

In the same way certain trade marks on merchandise settle all doubt of its worth.

You'll find that the name Westclox on alarm clocks and watches indicates a championship strain which the timepieces themselves bear out both in appearance and performance.

For a slight difference in price you'd choose the pure bred over the scrub every time. It will cost you very little if any more to own a Westclox with its record of faithful timekeeping and punctual calling.

The name Westclox is on the dial and six-sided, orange-bordered tag. Priced from $2.00 to $6.00.

SEAMAN-KENT HARDWOOD FLOORING

THE towering apartment house rising high above its modest neighbors is more than a masterpiece of constructive genius. It is a city of small homes, each representing a problem in personal comfort. Everything that modern ingenuity can accomplish toward this end goes into them. Not the least factor is the hardwood flooring.

Beaver Brand Hardwood Flooring is the first choice of builders who think in terms of the future as well as the present. All hardwood floorings may look alike when purchased, but these men must be sure of satisfaction, five, ten, twenty years hence. Seaman-Kent Beaver Brand is their guarantee.

In luxurious private homes Beaver Brand Hardwood Flooring becomes a necessity. It is the logical groundwork of interior construction and of first importance from the artistic sense. Rich hangings, furniture, bric-a-brac depend on its elegant surface for the attainment of dignity and charm. Beaver Brand flooring is at once the first thought and the finishing touch.

The smaller home also is enhanced by Beaver Brand Hardwood Flooring. Priced within reach of every purse, it appeals to those who are building that home of their own or replacing their old pine floors. Beaver Brand is economical—durable, sanitary and easily kept clean. Its beautiful finish saves the expense of floor coverings. Perfectly matched and milled, anyone can lay it.

There is a dealer in every city and town in Canada who is glad to give full information at any time—prompt and efficient service of supply.

In "Velvet Paws and Shiny Eyes," by Carol Cassidy Cole, we have a delightful book for the youngsters who should find Eric Oldson and his friends in the forest the most stimulating adventurers. We grieve over Mr. Mink, the cruel father, tolerate Mr. Skunk and like Reddy Squirrel best of all. No family circle is complete without the touch of "Velvet Paws" and the gleam of "Shiny Eyes." (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, seventy-five cents).

"Flowing Gold" by Rex Beach, will attract all those readers who found "The Spoilers" and "The Silver Horde" exciting tales of adventure. Rex Beach writes with an eye for the movies and does not hesitate to pile sensation on sensation. The oil fields of Texas are the scene of his latest romance which is the story of a struggle between financiers who are experienced in the game. There is a charming heroine, of whom the hero is far from worthy. In fact Buddy Briskow is a blustering youth who proves a bore. The story itself will be widely read by those who worship at the shrine of Douglas Fairbanks. (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, $2.00)

"Fires of Driftwood," by Isabel Ecclestone Mackay is a book written by one who is, indeed, a poet. There is a horrible fear, at times, that Mrs. Mackay is going to break forth in free verse, for I should hate to have so gracious a style spoiled by the gulps and gaps of the free versifier. So far, however, this poet who really cares for the beautiful in form has avoided the paths which lead to all-but-prose. This latest volume is a contribution to literature and "The Fires of Driftwood" have the genuine poetic flame. There are a dozen poems in the volume which one longs to quote, but at this time, let us give you three verses of "A Christmas Child."

"She needed me, I learned to know the royal joy that service brings,
She was so helpless that I grew to love all little helpless things.
She trusted me, and I who ne'er had trusted, save in self, grew cold
With panic lest this precious life should know no stronger, surer hold.

She lay and smiled and in her eyes I, watched my narrow world grow broad Within her tiny crumpled hand I touched the mighty hand of God."

These poems have been published before in various magazines and their appearance in a volume is warmly welcomed. "Out of Babylon" is one of the most remarkable and poignant in the book. The closing cry is the lament of one with "honor rooted in dishonor."

"To Babylon, to Babylon!

And every step I take

Bears farther off from Babylon

A heart that cannot break."

(Published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart, Price $1.50)

"Salt Seas and Sailormen," by Frederick William Wallace is the work of a writer who knows the high seas with an experience many fathoms deep. There are seven stories in this volume which breathes of the briny waves off Nova Scotia;—and the best of them all is "Tommy Decker's Tartar." They are all worth while yarns and if you read the first, "The Sail Dragger," you will read them all. (Published in Toronto by Hodder and Stoughton Ltd. Price, $1.75)

"Judy of York Hill" by Ethel Hume is a school story for girls which is decidedly exhilarating in its natural high spirits and appreciation of just how jolly a life at York Hill may be. Girls of to-day and girls of yesterday may well be interested in this tale of Judith and her happy year at the school which meant work and play and friendship. (Published in Toronto by Thomas Allen. Price, $1.50)

"The Sky Movies;" by Gaylord Johnson is an excellent book on "the heavens above," with illustrations which make the story of the moon and the stars more real to the reader. It is astronomy, as Puck tells it, and a tale worth listening to every evening (Published in Toronto by the Macmillan Company, Price, $1.50)

"Encore," by Jessie Alexander, is a new book of reminiscences, readings, hints on programmes, etc., written and compiled by one who is familiar with the evolution of elocution, and whose work has been a delight to thousand of Canadians. This volume will be a valued gift, we are sure, at the Christmas season, and will prove exceptionally welcome to the talented young student, who is interested in the vocal interpretation of literature. The writer, Jessie Alexander, (Mrs. Roberts) is so brimful of the joy of life that it is no wonder the story of her platform career has had "encore" in every chapter. (Published in Toronto by McClelland and Stewart. Price $1.50)

An ornate trellis of slender wood, painted to a blue-green that suggests the lovely coloring of an opal, adorns the walls of this delightful sunporch. WRITING on the subject of the popularity of the "cave man" hero in recent fiction, Katharine Fullerton Gerould says in the "Harper's Magazine":

"Since the prehistoric days of the matriarchate the average woman has enjoyed—in imagination, at least—the legend of the dominant male. In no morbid sense, she has liked the spectacle of a creature stronger than herself. The feminist philosophy may be very pretty; but it does not happen to be true—as the heart of the average woman will bear witness. If I might be allowed to put the situation in vulgarly graphic form, I should do it thus. Granted that, as history and literature have always implied, there is a tiger latent in every male. The American tiger has, you might say, taken himself to the taxidermist, and got himself beautifully mounted as a rug. The American woman then sits on the rug, in front of the fire, and digs her little heels into the helpless fur. (There is really nothing else to do with a rug.) People always find charm in what they have not, even if they would choose, in preference, what they have. The American woman wanted her rug—and got it. But her imagination was going, inevitably, to play about the image of the traditional tiger before he went to the taxidermist. She does not really want a cave man—not yet, at least; she is too comfortable as she is. But she likes to think that her man could be a cave man if he wanted to. What she really wants is the true tiger lying down in front of her to dig her heels into, knowing all the time that the tiger could bite if it chose. Chivalry consists in not choosing to bite—not in being unable to. So you get various writers who cater to the undistinguished millions, pretending that the visit to the taxidermist was only a feint; that the eyes will roll, and the claws unsheathe themselves, and the jaws snap. The feminine reader shivers with delight at the animation of her rug; she experiences that perfect condition of eating her cake and having it too."

A popular Lincoln myth will obtain a new currency from Mr. Taft's speech to the Press Club the other day, remarks the Manchester Guardian. He quoted as Lincoln's the familiar saying, "You can fool all the people part of the time and part of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time."

A few years ago the authenticity of this saying was investigated, and no ground whatever could be found for attributing it to Lincoln. It does not occur in any of the great President's writings or speeches, and neither Mr. Hay nor Mr. Nicolay—who collaborated in the authoritative Lincoln biography—was able to discover any trace of it. According to Mr. A. R. Spofford of the Library of Congress, who carried out the inquiry, the real author of the saying was Phineas T. Barnum. If so we have underrated Barnum.

One would prefer to believe that it was Lincoln who said it, and, in spite of historical research, probably it was.

UNDERCLOTHING
THAT WILL NOT SHRINK

"Guaranteed not to prickle."

This is a positive fact and we will return the purchase price to anyone who can produce a "CEETEE" garment that "prickles" or irritates in any way.

"CEETEE" is the only Canadian made under-clothing that is knit to fit the human form.

One reason why it is so popular is, it's made with low neck and no sleeves and in knee or ankle lengths.

"CEETEE" can be worn with any dress, from the heaviest to the sheerest.

In its downy softness, the feel of a "CEETEE" garment is like the caress of a baby's cheek.

Only purest Australian Merino Wool is used, making "CEETEE" so soft that a baby can wear it.

If a baby can wear it—you can.

Just ask your doctor what under-clothing you should wear in the winter time. He'll say: "All-Wool."

Go to the most reputable dealer you know and ask him what is the best all-wool under-clothing and he'll say: "CEETEE"

Costs a trifle more at first, but it's the cheapest in the long run.

But he was more irritated than ever when he read the sweep's reply, which appeared in the next copy of the paper:

Casserole Cooking

BY FRANCIS M. McNALLY

"En casserole" is a term applied to dishes which are cooked and served in the same fire-proof earthen ware or glass utensil. Usually the material is first prepared in the frying pan and then transferred to the casserole to finish cooking by a long slow process. The advantages of this method of cooking are many: (1) It is economical as materials often too tough for ordinary cooking may by this means be served in a nutritious and tender condition. (2) All the nutritious elements of the food are retained, the snugly fitting cover prevents escaping of the aromas and flavours. (3) The ingredients may be put together in a casserole and allowed to stand for hours in it before cooking, without risk of discoloration or metallic contamination, so it is possible to prepare the main dinner or supper dish early in the day. (4) The cooked food may be left in a casserole with perfect safety as long as desired. This is a decided advantage, where meals are necessarily irregular. (5) The use of the casserole does away with re-dishing and assures hot service of the food.

Many varieties of casseroles may now be obtained at prices within the reach of the modest housewife's pocket book. They vary in size and shape from the individual dish to a size sufficient to serve a large family. Brown, green, blue, or yellow stoveware and fireproof glass are materials most commonly used. They are readily cleaned on account of their perfectly hard and unbroken surfaces and they make attractive serving dishes. Holders of silver, nickel or copper in which to place the casseroles when taken from the oven add to the attractiveness of the dish. They also add to the expense, however, and a platter or tray will answer the purpose which is simply to keep the hot casseroles from coming in contact with the table.

Before being used for the first time casseroles should be soaked in cold water for some hours, to prevent cracking on their first exposure to heat. The heat should be applied gradually and the dishes should never be placed in the oven without either water or fat in them.

The amount of liquid used in casserole cooking should be relatively small and generally seasoned. This method of cooking is especially desirable for the tougher meats and for left overs, which are apt to be somewhat lacking in flavor. The use of a nicely seasoned sauce allows for absorbing of flavour during the cooking.

Beef en casserole: Two pounds lean beef, one bunch celery, four onions, two cups tomato, one cup cooked macaroni, one-half pound grated cheese, one cup mushrooms, seasonings. Cut the meat, celery and onions into small pieces and place in a hot frying pan, cook, stirring constantly until well browned. Remove from fire and place in a large casserole and add the remaining ingredients. Place in moderate oven and cook for two hours.

Swiss Steak: One and one-half pounds round steak cut two inches in thickness, one carrot, one small turnip, one onion, one tomato, one bay leaf, salt and pepper, one cup boiling water, two tablespoons dripping or butter. Sprinkle the steak with flour. Melt the fat in a frying pan and brown the steak in it, then remove the steak to casserole. Fry for a few minutes the onions, carrot, turnip and sliced tomato and add them to the steak in casserole. Add the bay leaf and seasonings. Pour in the boiling water, cover and simmer for two hours.

Ragout of Beef: Cut two pounds of round steak into inch squares, sprinkle with salt and pepper and roll in flour. Put into a saucepan two tablespoons of butter or dripping or suet to cover the bottom of the pan, when fat is hot add the meat and cook until well browned on all sides. Draw the meat to one side of pan, add one tablespoon of flour and brown, then add one cup of stock or water and stir constantly until it thickens. Add one teaspoon salt, one-half teaspoon pepper, one-half teaspoon kitchen bouquet, one carrot, cut into dice, and one tablespoon chopped onion. Place all in a casserole and bake for one hour.

Meat Balls en casserole: One pound lean round steak, (ground fine) three cups soup stock, one egg, one-half cup bread crumbs, two large onions, one green pepper, one-half cup tomatoes, two cups potatoes (cubed) four small onions, one-half cup finely chopped parsley, one teaspoon Worcestershire sauce, salt, pepper, paprika. Slice one large onion and fry in melted fat until brown, then remove it to the casserole. Mix together the beef, the egg (slightly beaten), bread crumbs, parsley, the remaining large onion and seasonings. Form into balls, roll in flour and fry in melted fat until brown, then place in casserole. Add the tomato, the pepper, soup stock, and Worcestershire sauce. Let cook in a slow oven for two hours. Add potatoes and small onions and cook thirty minutes longer.

Lamb Chops en casserole: Eight Lamb Chops, two cups soup stock, two slices onion, two cups cubed potatoes, two cups peas, seasonings. Brown the chops slightly and quickly, in as little fat as possible, and place in casserole. Add the stock, the onion fried, golden-brown the potatoes, and peas. Cook for thirty minutes in moderate oven.

Casserole of Cod-Fish and Rice: Cover one-half cup of rice with two cups cold water, put over the fire and stir occasionally to prevent it sticking, boil five minutes, drain in a sieve, and rinse with cold water. Return to the fire in a double boiler and add one and one-quarter cups milk and cook until the milk is absorbed. Place in a casserole. Add one cup salt codfish, which has been soaked over night, and one-half cup medium white sauce. Sprinkle with buttered crumbs and bake for thirty minutes.

Finnan-Haddie a la Delmonico: Wash one pound of fish thoroughly and soak in cold water for one-half hour. Drain, cover with water just below the boiling point and let stand fifteen minutes. Drain and wipe dry. Remove skin and bones and separate fish into flakes. Put the flaked fish into a buttered casserole, pour over it a thin white sauce equal in quantity to the fish, cover with buttered crumbs and bake thirty minutes.

Chicken en casserole: One large chicken, three tablespoons dripping, two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, three cups chicken stock, one tablespoon kitchen bouquet, one cup oysters, seasonings. Clean the fowl and cut into pieces, removing skin and as many bones as possible. Heat the dripping in a frying pan and in it fry the pieces until surface of meat is thoroughly seared. Take out and drain on paper. Melt the butter, add the flour, and when blended stir in the stock to make a sauce. Add kitchen bouquet and seasonings. Strain the sauce into a casserole, add the chicken. Cook in a moderate oven for one and one-half hours or until chicken is tender. About fifteen minutes before serving add oysters, scalded and cut into halves.

Chicken ramequins: One and one-half cups cooked chicken cut in small pieces, one cup peas, one-half cup mushrooms, one-quarter cup butter, two tablespoons flour, one-half cup chicken stock, one-half cup cream, seasonings. Melt the butter, add the flour and stir until frothy. Add stock and cream gradually, stirring constantly until mixture thickens. Add seasonings. Combine this sauce with chicken, peas, and mushrooms. Place in buttered ramequins, sprinkle with buttered crumbs and bake for twenty minutes.

Ham en casserole: One slice of ham, cut thick, one small onion chopped, one bay leaf, one blade mace from cloves, one-half teaspoon celery seed, one small sweet pepper, salt and pepper, cider. Brown the ham on both sides in a hot frying pan then place it in a casserole, adding chopped onion, pepper and seasonings. Pour over it enough sweet cider to almost cover the ham. Bake slowly for two and a half or three hours. Serve with tomato sauce and stripped potatoes.

Little Mothers' League in Manitoba

"But you haven't seen my 'Little Mothers' League' Class yet," arrested our departure from a large school in the suburbs of Winnipeg. It was the Public Health Nurse, who called after us, and, because we didn't want to miss seeing any of the work being carried on as a part of health education, we followed the Nurse to a room, which we learned was used as a centre for Health Service, not only for the school, but for the community as well.

We found the Little Mothers' League Class in session. The girls in their white caps and aprons were having a lesson in Home Nursing. "To be ready to serve others in need," seemed to be felt rather than heard, as the underlying motive of the girls' work, as we watched their instruction in Winnipeg Schools. That the experiment proved the need of such instruction is instanced by the fact that it is now given by the school nurses as a regular part of their work.

In Manitoba, outside of the City of Winnipeg, "Little Mothers' Leagues" were first organized in Brandon in 1917. The public health nurse, who formed the classes there felt however, that the girls needed instruction in the rudiments of Home Nursing and First Aid, and Sanitation in addition to "Care of Babies," and, the wisdom of this has been borne out by the interest and enthusiasm, not only of the students, themselves, but, their mothers as well; many of them, doubtless remember occasions when unable to obtain a nurse, how helpless they earnestness of purpose in learning thoroughly the work in hand.

Personal Hygiene, Home Sanitation, Care of Babies and Rudiments of Home Nursing and First Aid, are the subjects taught in these classes, which are formed for the senior girls in the public schools in centres where it is possible for the public health nurse to visit the schools frequently.

It is the aim of the public health nurses to extend this teaching to every rural school as circumstances permit.

Sometimes classes are organized for older girls in the primary grades, who through force of circumstances, will in all probability leave school before reaching the higher grades.

Printed notes of each lesson are given to the members of the class to place in note books for future reference.

Examinations, both written and practical, are held at the conclusion of the course of instruction, and diplomas are given to the successful students by the Provincial Board of Health.

Little Mothers' Leagues were first organized in New York City Schools in 1909, as part of the campaign in reducing the infant mortality rate. The instruction consisted in teaching the girls "The Care of Babies." The result of this teaching was found to be so successful that it now holds an important place in work for Child Welfare.

It was in 1912 that the Margaret Scott Nursing Mission attempted to give such felt in performing the simplest of nursing tasks.

This year a number of Little Mothers' Leagues are organizing Team Demonstrations under the auspices of the "Boys and Girls" Clubs in "Home Nursing" and "Care of the Baby."

The Manitoba branch of the Red Cross Society have arranged to bring in to Winnipeg the winning Teams for the final competition; and judging from some of the excellent demonstrations of work, which have already been given by these Teams in some of the districts, they will no doubt be among the most interesting events of the Boys and Girls Team Work, to be held in Winnipeg in September next.

We believe that Manitoba is the first Province in the Dominion of Canada, and most likely in North America, to foster this phase of health education by Team Demonstrations, and, last but not by any means the least, to Manitoba belongs the credit of organizing Little Mothers' Leagues as part of the school curriculum.

Casserole Cooking

Egg and Potato Pie: Six hard cooked eggs, one cup medium white sauce, ten boiled potatoes, two tablespoons butter, three tablespoons cream, and season with salt and pepper. Fill a casserole with alternate layers of the potato mixture sprinkled with chopped parsley, the sliced eggs and white sauce. Cover top with mashed potatoes, smooth carefully over and mark with a fork, brush with beaten egg. Bake one-half hour in moderately hot oven.

Cheese Soufflé: One half cup grated cheese, two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, two eggs, two-thirds cup milk, seasonings. Make a white sauce of the butter, flour and milk, add the seasonings. Remove from the fire and add the yolks of the eggs, slightly beaten, and the cheese. Fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Place in a casserole and bake for ten minutes in a slow oven. Serve at once.

Baked Onions: Six onions, one cup milk, one tablespoon fine tapioca, one tablespoon butter, one tablespoon chopped parsley seasonings as desired. Peel onions and boil tender in salted water. Drain and place in casserole. Add the remaining ingredients and bake for one hour.

Carrots a la Pompadour: One cup cooked sliced carrots, one cup cooked sliced potatoes, two tablespoons butter, two tablespoons flour, one cup milk, two tablespoons grated cheese, salt and pepper, to taste. Make a white sauce of the butter, flour and milk, and while it is hot add the cheese. Place carrots and potatoes in a casserole season, pour over the cheese sauce. Cover with buttered crumbs and bake for ten minutes.

Stuffed Peppers: Six sweet green peppers, one-quarter cup each of chopped cooked ham and bread crumbs, one tablespoon chopped parsley, one-half cup tomatoes, two tablespoons butter, one slice onion (chopped) salt and pepper. Cut a piece off the stem end of each pepper and remove the seeds and partitions. Drop them into boiling water and boil for ten minutes. Stuff the peppers with the remaining ingredients mixed together. Cover the top of each with buttered crumbs. Place in a casserole, add a little water, and bake in a moderate oven for three-quarters of an hour.

Candied sweet Potatoes: Four sweet potatoes, one tablespoon butter, one cup molasses, salt and pepper. Select yellow sweet potatoes, peel and slice them lengthwise. Boil, using small amount of water as possible. Drain and add butter, salt and pepper. Place in a casserole and pour over them the molasses. Bake until molasses candies over potatoes.

—these new comfort creators for your baby

This offers two new comfort creators for babies.

They come from the Bauer & Black laboratories, for 28 years specialists in filling doctors' wants, and are based upon the experience, in daily practice, of 112 leading children's doctors, nurses and dermatologists.

Your druggist has them—Bauer & Black Baby Talc and Bauer & Black Baby Soap.

Next to Proper Diet —Correct Care of the Skin

Ask baby specialists. Ask heads of maternity hospitals. They will tell you that next in importance to proper diet comes the proper care of baby's skin.

Most babies suffer from rashes and irritations, and when a healthy baby is cross and fretful, it is more often for that reason than any other.

Some of these irritations come from the semi-acid discharges of perspiration or urine, often powerful enough to cause rawness, but always powerful enough to cause baby intense discomfort—torturous itching.

Others from the use of harsh soaps.

What Doctors Said Was Needed

Scores of baby doctors told us the need of applying modern principles to the care of infants' skin.

So we consulted eminent authorities—skin specialists, baby specialists.

The result, after months of laboratory work, is a new hygiene of the nursery.

First, a soap actually made to meet the delicate skin requirements of a baby—oxide of zinc, soothing oils, edible fat—a protection for mothers against soaps masquerading as harmless.

Second, an exquisite powder, quite different from any you have known. A medicinal preparation combined with finest talc.

It overcomes the irritant effects of perspiration and urine. Combats them according to latest scientific findings.

Old methods attempted merely to dry the moisture. This new way overcomes its harmfulness. And thus marks a new era in baby comfort.

It acts instantly. You use it the same as an ordinary powder. Many of the most prominent maternity hospitals in the United States and Canada employ it. And foremost doctors prescribe it.

Charming Packages—Free

What About Your Children

BY WILL H. GRAY

IT seems to be the fashion to deplore the sophistication of our present-day youth, and to look on them as having a good start on the road to perdition. But, it might be asked, what are we parents doing? Perhaps when you see Jessie, who is fourteen, with powder on her nose and carmine on her lips you tell her she is a silly little ass, and let it go at that. Do you bother to know where or how she spends her time after school? Well, if you don't you might as well shoulder the responsibility at once.

Why blame Mrs. Smith up the road and call her a snob because she won't let her Mabel associate with your Jessie? She has not your means or leisure, or education for that matter, and yet Mabel is among a set where your girl would not be welcome at present. It is just the same with Tom. He calls the Smith children sissies and stick-in-the-muds because they are seldom out at night without their parents, and George Smith has never been in a pool room in his life. Still the Smith children seem to have lots of fun.

"Oh yes," Tom grudgingly admits, "they enjoy themselves in their own harmless way. George belongs to the Boy Scouts, and collects stamps and bugs and things, and the girl is crazy about tennis; but she can't jazz worth a darn, though she can waltz in an old fashioned sort of way. As for that habit they have of tagging their parents about where ever they go, it gives me a pain."

Mr. Smith is in an office and draws one hundred and fifty dollars a month, and finds he needs it all too. He is always interested in anything that will be of help to his children. He religiously reads the two children's magazines that come to his house, in order to, "sense the slant of the rising generation," as he laughingly puts it. From these papers he gets ideas, and many a badly wanted dollar goes on something that will open up new vistas of thought in the minds of George or Mabel for months to come.

Mrs. Smith does her part nobly. She only had the education provided by a country school. But she is going to see that her children have the chance of going to the University if they want to. And what is more, she is instilling into them a thirst for knowledge that will insure them wanting to.

In the winter there is open house every other Saturday evening with games and dancing and theatricals, and as Archie Moffat told his parents, Mr. and Mrs. Smith were the biggest kids there. In the summer there is the tennis court and under the big maple tree a table with a large jug of lemonade and a pile of sandwiches, which Mabel and Jack had cut and wrapped in damp cheese cloth.

* *

DURING the holidays they rent the house and go off to the lake-shore for two months. Mr. Smith joins them for week ends and for his two weeks in August. His plans are more ambitious for next year, for he hopes to send them to the sea-shore for July and spend the latter half with them. In the meantime he is reading up about crabs and shrimps and shells and he and the children have already paid two visits to the museum to help out their book knowledge.

When George or Mabel come home with a new hobby he is not cross with them for so easily forsaking the last one. He understands the versatility of youth, gets down the encyclopaedia, reads every word on the new subject, and at the end makes notes of the books referred to. Then Mabel goes off post haste to the library and that night the whole Smith family are busy studying geology as they never studied anything before. And why on earth geology? All because Mabel sat next to a lady in the street car who was wearing an amber necklace in one of whose beads there was an ant entombed just as if it were yesterday

More Smiles Now For women have prettier teeth

A new way of teeth cleaning has multiplied smiles. Millions of women now use it. It has changed dingy teeth to whiter teeth. Wherever you look now you see pretty teeth which other people envy.

This new method is at your command. A free test will be sent for the asking. For the sake of whiter, safer teeth we urge you to accept it.

Combats the film

This new way combats film—that viscous coat you feel. The old ways of brushing never did that effectively.

Film clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. It absorbs stains and, if you leave it, forms the basis of cloudy coats, including tartar. That's why most teeth look dingy.

Film also holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay. Germs breed by millions in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea.

Most tooth troubles, which few escape, are now traced to that film.

Two methods found

Dental science, after long research, has found two ways to fight that film. Years of tests have amply proved their efficiency. Now leading dentists everywhere are advising their daily use.

A new-type tooth paste has been created, modern, scientific and correct. The name is Pepsodent. These two film combatants are now embodied in it. It is bringing to countless homes a new dental era.

Pepsodent CANADA
REG. IN

The New-Day Dentifrice

Endorsed by modern authorities and advised by leading dentists nearly all the world over now. All druggists supply the large tube.

Two other enemies

Teeth have two other great enemies. One is starch, which gums the teeth, and which may ferment and form acid. The other is mouth acids.

Pepsodent multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva, to better combat those starch deposits. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva, to better neutralize mouth acids. Thus it gives manifold power to Nature's great tooth-protecting agents. That's another result of modern dental research.

45 nations use it

Pepsodent now has world-wide use, largely through dental advice. Careful people of some forty-five countries see its benefits today.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

One week will convince you that you and yours should always use this method. Cut out the coupon now.

1325—Misses' Jacket. Designed for 14 to 20 years. No. 9392—Misses' Two-piece Gathered Skirt. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{1}{4}$ yard. The suit in size 16 requires $3\frac{1}{4}$ yards 54-inch suede cloth— $1\frac{3}{8}$ yard 40-inch crêpe de Chine for the jacket lining.

1304—Misses' Dress. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Width at lower edge about $1\frac{5}{8}$ yard. Size 16 requires $2\frac{3}{8}$ yards 54-inch serge— $\frac{1}{2}$ yard 40-inch satin. Embroidery in design 12717 is worked with silk floss in flat satin stitch.

1324 — Misses' Coat. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Size 16 requires $3\frac{3}{8}$ yards 54-inch wool velours— $3\frac{1}{2}$ yards 40-inch radium silk for lining. The sleeves of this coat usurp the attention that would ordinarily center on trimming which has been carefully avoided for this very reason. In their extreme width and deep set armholes, they bespeak a Chinese influence. In direct contrast to the flare of the sleeves is the straightness of the coat itself, the only break in the lines occurring at the waist-line where there is a neat sash. Two slashed set-in pockets are inserted one above the other at each side of the front. The closing buttons up to the neck where the coat is topped by a large convertible collar that rolls comfortably about the neck.

1319—Misses' Coat. Designed for 14 to 20 years. Size 16 requires $3\frac{3}{8}$ yards 54-inch camel's hair cloth— $3\frac{3}{4}$ yards 40-inch figured silk for lining. Revers that roll back as far as the waist-line add smartness to this top coat of mannish cut. It also observes the "wider the armholes the more modish the sleeve" rule laid down for all coats this Fall. The lower parts are finished with straps of self-material fastened in place with flat bone buttons. A large roomy pocket is stitched conveniently at each side of the front. A narrow belt of the material is worn. One of the new attractive printed silks is used for the lining.

About Furs and Fur Fashions

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY.

THE homely little muskrat, so called from the pungent odor its skin exudes, has provided fur coats for many more women than any other fur-bearing animal in the world. This is a very broad statement, but one that is confirmed by a furrier of many years experience. The fur known as Hudson Seal, so popular for the past decade, is muskrat dyed and dressed to look like real seal and coats of muskrat in its natural state are liked by the younger set. They look so unlike that one can scarcely believe they are the fur of the same animal. Incidentally the muskrat of Northern Ontario has a very thick fur and wears better than that of other parts.

A modish wrap of Hudson seal with shadow border, large collar and yoke, to which the full cape is gathered.

To convert muskrat into Hudson seal, the "guard" or coarse, long hairs that shed the water—for this is an amphibious animal—are removed by some process and the soft under fur shaved to an even thickness. The dyeing which requires skill and practice then takes place and eventually the plebeian muskrat emerges from the dresser's and dyer's establishment transformed to a veritable aristocrat and pet of fashion.

A furrier told me an interesting story recently which explains why muskrat skins are comparatively scarce and why the price of muskrat and Hudson seal coats remain so high. Those who buy these coats, it seems are paying the price of greed, the love of money being the root of high-priced furs, and—I know this won't be welcome news—we are warned that they may go higher, but let us hope they won't.

But to get back to my story: We have heard a great deal about the law of supply and demand the past few years, and are somewhat bored by it, nevertheless it always holds good, and back in 1920 when every marketable commodity had reached peak prices—a phrase coined during the war—raw rat skins brought the princely price of $5.00 each and trapping became such a lucrative occupation that wherever there were rats, there were trappers and the poor little animal was in great danger of extinction. This caused a shortage the following years with consequent high prices which might have been even steeper were it not that other furs are coming into fashion.

There is Persian lamb, for instance. This fur could not be bought in any quantity during the war for it was imported from Asia into Germany where it was dyed and then brought into Canada—it is now dyed in Canada—and of course could not be obtained. It is generally looked upon as a fur to be worn by mature people, at least not by the very young women, but that is, after all, a matter of opinion. Just here, let me warn you about being tempted by extraordinarily low-priced Persian lamb coats. During the war, it is said that there were a large quantity of lamb skins in Russia and these were sent to China to be disposed of there. The British Government heard about it and stopped the sale. They lay in China several seasons and were afterwards recalled by the Soviet Government who offered them for sale when the war was over. By this time the oil had dried out of the skins and with the oil went the wearing quality. Some of these may have reached this side of the water and furriers have issued a warning. It seems the owners have offered them for sale very cheap.

Broadtail is one of the most fashionable furs of the season, but it doesn't seem to tempt Canadian women, I don't know why for it is very beautiful; it is also very expensive. Grey and fawn caracul are much preferred as trimmings to the entire coat or wrap, although our U. S. cousins were quite wild over both these colors last year.

A well-known Toronto furrier once told me that Canadian women were the best judges of fur in the world, but I rather think that in these days of expert knowledge in all matters pertaining to dress,

Gossard Type Corsetry is the very foundation of that lovely picture every real woman wants to make of herself—and can, if she knows the secret

PERHAPS you have been buying your corsets by waist measure and leaving the rest to chance. That's fatal! Gossard artists haven't thought of you in such a vague way. You have been thought of as belonging to one of the nine figure groups and special models have been created with just the support you need at your age and weight to give you the proper proportions of the type to which you belong.

A Gossard Corset designed for your very own self is going to feel more comfortable than you thought a corset could. It's going to meet you everywhere, with a steady, uniform muscular support, but it isn't going to constrict or pinch you anywhere. The gracefully curved skirt of it, the slim front and back lines, the beautifully cut Gossard Brassieres you'll buy with it—these things are going to give your figure a delicate, moulded roundness.

The whole idea of Gossard Type Corsetry is to bring you to graceful proportions, one curve growing out of another with no part unduly emphasized. When this is done you will have an appearance of slimmness that the woman with a four-inch smaller waist and your own hip measurements can never have. A faithful following of this simple rule alone will take pounds and pounds away from a woman's apparent silhouette and years away from her apparent age.

Gossard Corsets, with their front-lacing comfort, their light scientific boning, their graceful, natural lines, are worth more to the woman who really cares about her health and appearance than can be put into dollars and cents. And yet, they are among the most reasonably priced articles of clothing to be had today.

Go to the best store you know; there you will be correctly fitted to a Gossard by a trained corsetiere who will know just how to idealize your figure. Or if you feel you have a very special corset problem and you'd like a bit of personal advice, write to Miss Jane Hill, the Gossard corset specialist and authority on becoming dress, whose years of experience and proven ability are at your service. Miss Hill has just completed a tiny gem of a book, "YOU." It talks of personalities and becoming clothes in a way that any woman who would make the most of her natural beauty, will treasure. About Furs and Fur Fashions there are others quite as good judges as ourselves, but there is one thing the Canadian woman almost always does and that is to select a fur that is not too conspicuous and wears well. That is why she likes Hudson seal, Canadian mink and beaver and Russian kolinsky. When nutria was in fashion, she scarcely looked at it, but she will some times yield to the plushy elegance of Russian mole in a wrap and young girls like sport coats of grey squirrel and for utility coats, if not muskrat, then raccoon which gives excellent wear.

Just a word about grey lamb which has come into fashion again after being eclipsed by other skins for a quarter of a century or more. This is used chiefly as trimmings on youthful cloth suits and children's coats. Monkey fur is one that we hear a great deal about this year and see on imported wraps, hats and even dresses. It is also used to trim Hudson seal, Persian lamb and caracul coats. Judging from the monkeys of our acquaintance—limited to those in the zoo—monkey fur trimmings would not be very alluring. But there are types and types, and Abyssinian monkey is beautiful except for its face. It has rich black fur on the back, surrounded by long white silky hair in the form of a saddle and the quality is regulated by the climate, the colder the more beautiful.

Paramount with the selection of the skin is the selection of the style, and notwithstanding our climate, fur capes are gaining many devotees in this country. Wraps are also the choice of many limousine ladies who neither toil nor spin, but the great majority are buying coats, which are longer this year than last, forty to fifty inches taking the place of the thirty-six to forty-two lengths of last year. But then you know we are wearing our skirts longer. The location of the waist line seems to be governed by the length of the skirt for it has dropped down also and is defined by a fancy cord girdle.

Nearly all the coats are trimmed with a contrasting fur and a very pretty effect is achieved in the Hudson seals by reversing the skins in horizontal bands around the bottom. These are called "shadow" stripes, and sometimes there are as many as four of them.

The linings are elegant also, especially in the more expensive models. On one that was shown in a fur store that is known all over the Dominion, the body was lined with blue charmeuse and the skirt peacock and gold brocade. This had an inside pocket with a draw-string in the top like a shopping bag.

TWO PRETTY POUCHETTES

The one on the left is made of grey crushed calf with gold frame, pannier handle and a change purse swung across the centre inside. Its companion is of the same leather in a basket shape with ruffled edge and a bronze filagree frame.

What About Your Children

instead of several million years ago that he lived and went about his busy little life among strange monsters that we can just guess at from the fossil remains that turn up from time to time.

In spite of all this study and wholesome amusement Tom Brightlight thinks the Smith children have a pretty thin time of it. They have, according to his standard. Take a child out of the slums and dress him like little Lord Fauntleroy and put him in a gorgeous mansion and you will have a very miserable child. As Kipling would say, "E's lost 'is gutter-devil; 'e as'n't got 'is pride." But in time he will grow into his new environment just as Tom would if he were cast among the Smiths for a spell.

What about theatres, dances, and picture shows? Good plays they regard as part of the children's education. For the phonograph they have records of the best singers, and when any of these come to town they make a point of hearing them if means will permit. George has made many an odd dollar cleaning out a basement or spading up a bit of garden. His rabbits and pigeons were profitable in their time, for he had really good ones. Mabel too has tasted the joy of sitting in a box seat nibbling chocolates and listening to "Lohengrin" with money she earned watching over sleeping children while their parents were out enjoying themselves. Mabel must pay her own way when she goes out with any of the boys who come to the house. Public dances are at present taboo, except the open air, daylight kind at summer resorts with their parents. Movies they go to occasionally, but the heaving breast of the sobbing heroine excites no thrills or cold shivers, for Mr. Smith's pointed remarks about unseen onions and ammonia keep them from being taken too seriously.

After all the Smiths are just a normal, healthy family with kindness, generosity and thoughtfulness bred into them. It is doubtful if Mr. Smith will ever be a very wealthy man. That is not his hobby. Money with him is a secondary, but very necessary, commodity. His greatest joy is improving his own mind in order that he may pass on the knowledge to his children and in doing so achieve a pleasure unapproached in any other manner. We hear a lot about the menace of Bolshevism and there is a menace. But if more of us take the interest in our children that the Smiths do we may sleep on easy beds without the vision of this fair Country of ours in a welter of blood, famine and pestilence that might easily engulf the whole world.

How You Can Have Prettier Dresses At Half the Cost

By Marjorie La Mar

I WANT TO TELL YOU about a new and wonderfully simple plan by which you can now learn right at home in spare time to make all your own and your children's clothes.

I want to tell you how you can not only have more and prettier dresses, suits and hats, but how you can save at least one-half of what you are now spending.

Does it sound almost too good to be true? Then, let me tell you about the Woman's Institute—the great school which is bringing the joy of better clothes at substantial savings to women and girls all over the world.

You say that you cannot sew a stitch or that you sew only a little? No matter! The Institute courses begin with the very simplest stitches and seams and proceed by logical steps until you learn the whole art of dressmaking—the designing, cutting, fitting and construction of garments of every kind.

The courses are so complete and practical that hundreds of students with absolutely no other preparation have opened shops of their own and enjoy large incomes and independence as professional dressmakers and milliners.

Best of all, you are not asked to spend long weeks on practice work. You begin almost at once to make actual garments. No matter where you live—no matter what your age or position in life, if you can be reached by the mails, you can learn dressmaking and millinery at home through the Woman's Institute.

Aren't you glad to know that at last you can have those pretty clothes and hats for which your heart has been longing all these years? And wouldn't you like to have the full story of the school and the methods that have made this possible? The way to get it is easy.

Send for this Handsome Booklet "Dressmaking Made Easy"

IT tells all about the Woman's Institute. It describes the courses in detail and tells how you, too, can learn easily and quickly, in spare time at home, to make your own clothes and hats, and dress better at less cost, or prepare for success in the dressmaking or millinery profession.

Use the coupon below or write a letter or post card to the Woman's Institute, Dept. 31-L, Scranton, Penna. Without cost or obligation, a copy of this handsome 64-page booklet will come to you, absolutely free, by return mail.

and there are ever so many things to make for that season. Also, if we do not suffer too much in face and hands from the roughness of the winter wind, it is just as well to prepare in this last month of autumn with healing lotions for the mischievous pranks which Jack Frost is sure to play.

THE LETTER BOX

MADELINE:—There is no necessity for you to despair regarding the complexion. Now, when the skin is in such a condition as you describe, nine times out of ten, the cause is indigestion. You should try to get such important organs as the stomach and the liver in good order before you consider creams or lotions. A greasy skin nearly always means too much rich food. Don't indulge in fried foods or rich pastry for a time. Be careful, also, about the quantity of butter or gravy which you have every day and, in other words, eat very plain food for a while and see if conditions do not improve. In the meantime, I am sending you the name of a lotion which softens and refines the skin. "Less candy" would also be a wise policy.

EDITH G.:—You need not be discouraged about the tan which seems to have a clinging little way of its own. Sunburn is gayly acquired, but it is really a serious matter to try to be rid of a coat of tan. I believe that the quality of skin has something to do with it. A very fine sensitive skin burns more readily than the thicker skin, but there is the alleviation that it loses the tan more quickly, while the thick-skinned woman is patiently applying milk of almonds and other reliable aids to the sunburn. I am sending you the names of several preparations which may help, and, in the meantime, do not despise the humble buttermilk as a bleaching agency.

MARGUERITE:—You did not enclose a stamped and addressed envelope with your inquiry. So, I am unable to refer to the name of the clay preparation concerning which you ask. I am sorry not to be more obliging, but the rules of the "column" do not admit of the mention here of a specific preparation. Wash the face thoroughly with a face brush and use a good soap and tepid water. Then squeeze out black-heads and apply a drop of eau de Cologne.

VIOLET:—I should be more than pleased to answer your inquiry, but it is impossible to do so and keep the rule which asks for a stamped and addressed envelope. You see, Mademoiselle Violet, we do not mention toilet preparations in this column, as such reference would be positive advertising—and you have no idea how very strict advertising authorities can be. One does not flout their views, even to raise the drooping head of a Violet. Wherefore, if you will be so good as to send me a stamped and addressed envelope, the information you ask for will be forwarded. In the meantime, powder your nose and smile

A lovely evening gown. Crepe Marocain is never so lovely as when its lines are simple. This is trimmed with a deep steel fringe.

To make you lovelier

ALL through the ages women's beauty has swayed the hearts of men; and every woman longs for her full share of this power.

However attractive you may be, it is possible to make yourself lovelier if you use the complete "Pompeian Beauty Toilette."

First, a touch of fragrant Pompeian DAY Cream. This is a vanishing cream that when worked well in is a protection for the skin against wind, sun, and dust—a delicate foundation to which powder adheres evenly, and from which it will not easily rub off.

Then, apply Pompeian BEAUTY Powder. It makes the skin beautifully fair and adds the charm of a delightful perfume.

Now a bit of Pompeian BLOOM for a softly glowing color. And do you know that you should always experiment in the placing of rouge? Study the contour of your face. Perhaps you will look better with more color on the cheek-bones. Perhaps it is the center of the cheek where a deeper shade looks well.

Lastly, dust over again with the powder in order to subdue the BLOOM. And instantly the face is radiant with added youth and beauty.

Before retiring, cleanse the face thoroughly with Pompeian NIGHT Cream (a cold cream). In the morning you will find the lines of fatigue have faded and your skin will be soft and velvety.

Pompeian FRAGRANCE, a talcum powder, smooth and refreshingly perfumed, brings you charm.

Pompeian Beauty Powder, Day Cream, Bloom, 60c each; Night Cream, 50c; Fragrance, 30c. At all toilet counters.

THERE is a peculiar tiresomeness in the conversation of certain persons who insist on talking about what they consider "real life"—meaning thereby all manner of nastiness. There are unpleasant things and desperately sad occurrences in life—tragedy enough and to spare before we reach the three-score-years-and-ten—and only an extremely foolish and one-sided character seeks to ignore the sadness. That tragic aspect is far from being the whole of life, however, and the most helpful persons we meet are those who prefer the sunshine to the shadow and who do not insist on dwelling on what is melancholy or sordid, to the exclusion of all that is bright and joyous. I admit that "Pollyanna" is a trifle too cheerful for my enjoyment—too automatic in her insistence that everyone should be "glad," even though the heavens are falling and your shoes are too tight. Pollyanna, however, has her uses and is not altogether a vain show. A social service worker told me the other day that Pollyanna had helped to cure a certain dismal child she knew of sulks and grumbling, and had actually made her a "good sport," for the small girl insisted on regarding her as a play-mate.

The most deliberately cheerful Pollyanna, with her galvanic gayety, is to be preferred to Auntie Doleful, with her sighs and lamentations and her constant wondering about "what the world is coming to." The world is coming to an end, sometime or other—but in the meantime, it seems fairly solid and most of the time highly ornamental. In fact, it is a good old world, even on a November morning, when the toast has been burned and the coal is scarce. The pessimists are to be avoided, especially in the days when there is something really the matter.

WE knew that the short skirts could not last forever. They were becoming so abbreviated that Dame Fashion, the most fickle authority in the world, was sure to make a change before another year went by. The new skirts, however, are not unduly long and there is no necessity for being anxious, as yet, about the trailing skirt. We remember the trailer and the dust which was accumulated and we hope, with all our hearts that it will not be visited upon us again. Of course, we can refuse to wear the "trailer" and have a battle royal with the fashion makers about it. We may as well admit that most women are keenly anxious to be in the fashion and are quite sad at the prospect of not being "smart." There is so much need for common-sense in the modern commercial world that street cars will be utterly opposed to the extreme lengthening of skirts, and crowded thoroughfares will make them almost an impossibility.

When we consider the evening gown, that which blooms after nine o'clock, we find the trailing skirt becoming, and hope that it may remain for a season or two, to bring back a lost dignity to the world of "what we wear." I remember a stately dame whom I admired very much in childhood. Her "best gown" in winter was a dark purple velvet, trimmed with silk fringe and having a sweeping train which made her entrance to any room a royal affair. She has long since gone to the land, where, let us hope, Fashion has no word to say. Yet for the sake of the days when her purple velvet gown held all romance in its folds, I have an affection for the train of regal proportions.

THERE is much discussion going on with more or less animation, concerning the woman who attempts to combine matrimony and a career. The novel recently published, "This Freedom," written by no less a person than Mr. A. S. M. Hutchinson, has increased the interest in this highly important matter. Mr. Hutchinson evidently thinks that it is iniquitous to try to be a wife and mother and run a bank at the same time. Either the home or the bank will be wrecked—and, in this case, it was the home which went utterly to smash. While the threefold disaster which befell the household of which Rosalie was the movable centre is rather difficult to credit, yet we are inclined to think that the hero of the book (a rather wearisome chap) was fair in his appeal to Rosalie to stay home and "mind the children."

"I don't care for the way in which the story is written," said a wise matron, "but I believe in what the author is trying to arrive at—the fact that no one can take a mother's place with her children, especially in the earliest years. There are cases where a mother is forced to turn bread-winner—and these are sad enough. But to choose deliberately to continue exacting business toil downtown when there are little children to be looked after is a very strange policy for a mother."

"It is being done—especially in the States," was the comment of another.

"Yes—and it is no wonder that one marriage out of twelve in that country ends in divorce. It can't be done successfully—combining business and marriage. Her home is a married woman's business."

So said the wise matron—and her words were more pleasing than "This Freedom's" hysteria.

In this sunny living room, the walls of sand-float plaster are tinted a warm light gray and the ceiling is finished in a very faint gray. The paneled woodwork is stained to the soft brown of old walnut: therefore, it is in perfect harmony with the furniture of both walnut and mahogany used in the room. In the antique rug hung above the wide fireplace and in the oriental rugs used on the dark-stained floor, a rosy shade of terra cotta predominates. The same shade of terra cotta, combined with old blue and yellow, appears again in the brocaded tapestry chosen for the fireside-chairs and footstool and in the parchment shade which tops the burnished copper lamp.

Pamela Pounce

trembling joy and crucial doubt; a colour that fluctuated, a vague and veiled glance. And a smile that wavered.

"Well, Miss?" panted Pamela, as the girl, letting herself fall into a chair, seemed to float away on a dream: "well, Miss, how did you enjoy of yourself? Wasn't my head the prettiest there by a long way? I don't think the Duchess herself had such a bit of real art, and I ought to know! I'm sure, if you only looked as you did upstairs in that little room when you took off your mask—"

"Oh, you dear kind thing, I never took off my mask at all."

"What, Miss?"

"Oh, I couldn't!"

"Of all the pities! There, I might as well have spared my trouble, I see. There ain't a mite of use in trying to help those that won't help themselves, that's flat!"

"Nay, pray, pray don't be vexed with me! You've been such a friend to me! You're the only friend I have! Oh, I must tell you! There's no one in the world I can tell."

There was such real distress in the girl's whole air, and at the same time, some pathetic hope that seemed to cast a pale beam across her trouble like sunshine on a gloomy day, that Pamela swallowed down her natural irritation and began to feel moreover that her efforts might prove to have been not so altogether wasted after all. More than this, how could she fail to be touched by the appeal: "You are my only friend"? Flattered, too, considering—and Pamela was far too sensible not to consider—the difference in their station.

"Oh," cried the plain Miss Vibart, as if the gentle look the milliner cast on her had been a Moses wand and the spring gushed forth under its touch. "Oh pity! Oh, why am I not beautiful, like Jane? I never envied her before—never, never—but oh, why did I go to the party at all? If I hadn't known him first, if he had not been so wonderful kind and clever and charming and loving to talk to me, and understanding me so—oh, oh, and so handsome! Oh, I'd never have known what he was if Jane had had him first!"

"There, don't cry, you poor thing! Why, now, you said you'd tell me about it, Miss, and I'm sure, I think it uncommon pleasant of you, Miss, and I'd never take advantage—no! 'Twill be as sacred—as sacred—no not if I was to be drawn and quartered! But there, Miss, why, how do you know 'tisn't all going to end lovely? How do you know the gentleman isn't like me and wouldn't rather have you than the beauty, fifty thousand times?"

Here came such a lifting of swimming eyes, such a timid smile that Pamela thought she, for one, never wanted to see anything sweeter than the face of the plain Miss Vibart.

And after that the confidences came, broken, halting, but explicit enough for such quick wits as those of Madame Mirabel's head woman. How Sarah had followed her mother, with a higher heart than she had ever carried in her bosom to any entertainment, into the great, splendid ball-room of Hampshire House, safe under her mask; and they had scarce been there a five minutes when up comes the Duchess of Queensbury in a great fuss, followed by a tall young gentleman, and she says to Mamma for the Duchess is Mamma's cousin by marriage, and has remembered the relationship since Jane came out, for Jane, she says, is the most beautiful creature in the world and "so she is," cried the loyal sister, breaking off her narrative with a trembling lip.

"Tis the young gentleman's looks I want to hear about," Miss Pounce interpolated skilfully. "Mr. W—I suppose? Him your lady Mamma was alluding to."

"Mr. W. it was, Mr. Walsingham. And oh, he's a person of great consequence, for he's the nephew and heir of the old Marquis of Harborough, him that succeeded his brother you know, and none of them ever married. And oh, dear, my dear friend—your name's Pounce, isn't it? I'd rather call you by your Christian name if you don't mind. Pamela? Oh, I like that. Dear Pamela, I thought when the Duchess introduced him and he bowed and smiled I'd never seen anything so agreeable, nor so well looking. With such straight and honest eyes and so kind a smile. And the Duchess was in such a fuss, as I told you she wouldn't listen to Mamma who wanted to explain about Jane, and I think she's a little deaf, too. 'Here, Edward,' she cries, 'here's Miss Vibart, what I've told you of and you'd better engage her at once, for once it gets about what a face is behind that mask, there'll be twenty clamouring for her. Oh, you're a lucky dog,' says she—that's the way she speaks, and I think it's rather gross, but Mamma won't have it, because she's a duchess—'Oh, you're a lucky dog,' she cries, 'and there won't be a buck in the room that won't want your blood when midnight comes and that face is revealed.'"

"Dear, to be sure," said Pamela, with a sucking breath. "And do you think Mr. W.—I can't help it, Miss, I shall always call him that: 'tis so mysterious like—didn't hear what your Mamma tried to tell the Duchess? Did he take you for your sister straight off?"

An overwhelming blush spread over the plain Miss Vibart's face.

"Oh, Pamela Pounce," she cried, "'twas very silly and cowardly of me, but I didn't want him to find out. I thought for once I'd know, even on false pretences, what it means to be admired and courted. And oh, my dear creature, yes, I'll be truthful. I liked him so much from the very first that I couldn't, I couldn't make up my mind to his going away and leaving me."

In the pause which ensued, the milliner discreetly waited while last night's heroine once again fell into a retrospective muse. Suddenly the girl broke out:

"'Twas the strangest thing! Our tastes met at every point. 'Never think, sir,' cries I to him, 'to find me entertaining company, for I'm the veriest country mouse—' 'Country!' cries he. 'Madam, there's no life for anyone but in the country to my mind. This town existence, what is it? How can anyone but an idiot substitute the fresh air and the green fields and the fine views and the wholesome activities, the pleasant neighbourly intercourse, for this inane round of dissipations in the atmosphere of smoke, the hideous confinement of brick and mortar and the feverish intercourse with strangers between people who can have naught in common, and as like as not can never meet again?'"

"La," cried Pamela, "how you remember it all, Miss! And sure, to my mind, 'twas scarce an auspicious opening."

"Nay, but it was, for it set me off laughing. And, cries I, an idiot and inane! 'You're vastly obliging, sir, but pray remember that I, at least, am subject to authority.' And so am I, madam," cried he, 'tis by my uncle's orders that I am in the town, so you and I may perhaps call ourselves the only sane people in a room full of vapidity. And such being the case,' he went on, 'you will allow me to add most respectfully that we scarce meet altogether as strangers, and that I trust our first meeting may not be the last.'"

The milliner gave a whistle. "Quick work," quoth she, "a most like putting on the feathers before the straw is stitched together."

"Oh, nay indeed!" cried the other again, "we were somehow so comfortably at home with each other from the first! And after we had danced a minuet—it is not vanity on my part to say that I can dance and that better than dear Jane, though, to be sure, it scarce matters how she steps for none will look but at her

Tender Gums

Made firm and healthy

Pyorrhocide Powder is the one dentrifice that contains the elements which exhaustive clinical research and tests have proved necessary for keeping the gums healthy as well as the teeth white and clean.

It cleans the teeth scientifically by removing the mucoid deposits before they become hard, gum-irritating tartar formations which are the principal cause of pyorrhea.

Pyorrhocide Powder strengthens tender gums, corrects bleeding gums; hardens soft spongy gums.

face—we got on amazing in the figures, and afterwards still better in the talk we had together. Never was there such harmony of taste, I do assure you; I told him how vastly I preferred the country gentleman to the town fop, and he told me the town young lady could never hold a candle to the fresh country creature that would be up betimes in the dairy, and still-room. And oh, a dairy is all my joy, and as to a still-room why, I scarce know how the time flies, once I'm in ours! Our housekeeper is very old, and Mamma is very kind and lets me help her. And there's no butter half so good as mine in the county, and the dear cows, I love the very sight of them. Aye and I can milk, too. And there's not a herb in the garden I don't know the use of. And—

"Why, Miss," said the milliner, amused, "what a mistress you'll be of a country house of your own, one of these days!"

"Why, that's what he said!"

"Did he indeed?" Pamela laughed out loud.

"Nay, but," the girl's face, which had wonderfully brightened, fell; "You must remember he thought I was the Beauty all the time! He has heard about Jane. 'Tis quite clear. He is in love with her without ever having seen her, and that was why the more charming, the more ardent, respectfully ardent, he was, the more my heart sank. Though indeed I do think our minds were in sympathy, and to be sure, sister scarce knows rhubarb from angelica, or cream cheese from curds."

"Ah, if I'd been you," said Pamela Pounce with fire, "I'd have pulled my mask off, Miss, and faced him and said, 'By your tongue you're a man of sense show yourself one by your eyes.'"

"Oh, you may talk," Sarah cast a desperate upward glance at the kindling face: "you that's so handsome! Little you know what it is to feel plain. 'Tis as I have told you, I couldn't, aye—that's the word!—face it. And so I slipped from him, even as all the assembly was summoned to the supper room, and hid myself. And oh," cried Sarah, between laughing and crying, "when Mamma found me at last, sitting with the maids among the cloaks, she was very angry at first. And where have you been?" cries she. "The Duchess and Mr. W. have been looking for you everywhere. Mr. Walsingham's mad after you, child, and oh," here Sarah sobbed, "she was most angry because she thought he had liked me too much. And when I told her he took me for sister, 'why,' said she, 'put on your mask this minute, Miss. And I forbid you ever to let on that you took Jane's place. He has told the Duchess that you are the most intelligent young woman, that your mind and your principles are all he could desire—believing you to be Jane of course. Things could not be better! His intentions are most serious!' And now," cried Sarah, drying her eyes desperately, "Sister's had her tooth out this morning, and the apothecary says in a week there'll be nothing to show for it. And though there's been a message from the Duchess to say Mr. W. wished to call to-day, Mamma had wrote back that Jane has taken a cold at the masked ball and must keep her room for a few days. But oh, Pamela, when he comes and looks upon her—why, you can guess how it will be!"

"'Tis a monstrous shame," the partisan exclaimed. "I wouldn't put up with it, Miss. And all the time 'tis yourself he'll think he's getting. You ought to up and tell him straight and let him make his choice."

But Sarah, pulling on her shabby gloves and drawing her hat over her red eyes, shook her head. "I couldn't do that," said she. "Mamma says if I breathe a word 'twill be the basest treachery to sister. And she'll keep me out of the way," she added under her breath.

The Backbone of Style

A garment is no better than the material from which it is made. Therefore in selecting your Fall clothes you should be as critical about the quality of the cloth as you are about the style and workmanship.

The new Hawthorn Velour now being featured in the better grade coats is a fabric of unusual quality and beauty.

The name Hawthorn in a garment is a guarantee that the fabric used—whether velour, herringbone, homespun or knitted tweed—is of superior quality. It will hold its stylish lines and give longest wear.

A painted finish for the walls has the twofold point in its favor of being easy to clean at any time and equally easy to disinfect in the event of contagious disease invading the nursery. As a safeguard against little fingermarks and other evidences of use, it is, indeed, a good plan to have at least the lower portion of the walls painted, even though wallpaper is to be employed above the dado thus formed. Whether the paint be of the "flat" or the "gloss" finish, of the "oil" or of the "cold water" variety, is a matter of personal choice; and, fortunately, with any of these, very delightful results can be achieved—even by an amateur decorator—thanks to the explicit directions which manufacturers now supply.

With painted or tinted walls as a nucleus, a paneled effect can be secured intervals a quaint conception of a little Dresden shepherdess, arrayed in rose and blue, guarding a tiny flock of snowy lambs. Used above a painted dado of soft blue-green and with woodwork similarly finished, the effect of this paper could be scarcely other than eye-gratifying. Small Hollanders, garbed in bright Dutch blue, orange and white, enliven a pale yellow paper that would be effective with woodwork of either white or parchment yellow. The quaint children of Kate Greenaway and the characters of Mother Goose adorn many of the patterned nursery papers: parrots, butterflies and flowers make still others colorful.

Plain papers, however, in restrained tones of gray, yellow, tan, green and blue are frequently chosen instead, because they afford greater leeway for the infor a comparatively small outlay by the use of narrow wood-mouldings, preferably finished to match the walls. The paneling creates an appropriate background for the well-selected and suitably-framed pictures which are a necessary feature of a well-ordered nursery, if an appreciation of art is to be inculcated in the small occupant. Sometimes, too, the larger panels are painted in a somewhat broad "poster" style with scenes depicting well-known nursery-rhymes, fairy tales or legendary lore—and this is a wall-treatment that will especially commend itself to parents desirous of attaining something quite distinctive in the way of nursery decoration.

For the tinies of mortals this nursery has quite obviously been fitted. The walls and ceiling are papered alike in a pale yellow paper that is faintly self-patterned. The woodwork is enameled in ivory-white and all the furniture is similarly finished—the ancient corner-cabine, however being distinguished by naturalistic nosegays in deep yellow blue rose and green. Green too is the rug a green that holds much yellow in its depths. Dotted muslin curtains appropriately befrilled adorn the windows and fluffy shades of the same material lined with shell-pink soften the glare of the electrics.

Attractive as the painted walls may be, there are wallpapers exclusively designed for nursery use that are no less alluring. One very charming paper of a light bluish-green hue carries at frequent production of pictures, patterned rugs and hangings, and for all other accessories having designs that might conflict with that of a fanciful paper. The plain papers, too, are sometimes decorated with "cut-outs" of animals or the favorite characters of folklore and fairytale, which can be used to good advantage educationally. To preserve pictures thus applied, a thin coating of shellac or varnish is advisable.

The wood-trim in a child's room should be painted or enameled in white or in some light color that harmonizes with the coloring of the walls. The present vogue for matching walls and woodwork has of late been extended to the nursery, where it is particularly valuable on account of the diversity of objects and colors that are usually found in the room. The lighter colors are generally

The Expectant Mother Advice of Doctors

THE expectant mother bears a double responsibility. Her own health, as well as the safety of the tender, growing life in her keeping, depends upon the bodily care exercised during this period. Not only is she burdened with the elimination of a double waste, her own and that of the infant, but she must guard against constipation which so commonly afflicts the expectant mother.

If the food waste is not regularly and thoroughly eliminated, poisons are formed, absorbed by the blood and carried through the system. As a prominent authority states, inevitably these poisons affect the cells which provide for the unborn baby's nourishment.

Laxatives and cathartics are particularly to be avoided by the expectant mother, for as eminent physicians point out, they are likewise absorbed, thus endangering the infant, and produce only temporary effect at the expense of permanent injury. No wonder that science has sought a newer, better way. After years of study there has been found in lubrication a means as simple as Nature itself.

Lubrication

In perfect health a natural lubricant keeps the food waste soft. Thus it is easily eliminated. But when you are constipated there is not enough of Nature's lubricating liquid produced in the bowel to keep the food waste soft and moving. To find something to take the place of this natural lubricant, leading medical authorities conducted exhaustive research. They discovered that the gentle lubricant, Nujol, acts like this natural lubricant and thus replaces it.

As Nujol is not a laxative, it cannot gripe. It is not a medicine in any sense of the word, and like pure water, it is harmless and pleasant to take. Unlike laxatives, no particle of Nujol is absorbed into the system and thus it cannot affect the infant. Nujol is used in leading maternity hospitals throughout the world and is widely recommended by baby specialists.

Test Nujol for yourself. For sale by all druggists.

THE FUTURE OF MEDICINE

Great changes are taking place in the Medical world at present, and discussions on the future of Medical work often come up in ordinary conversation as well as in the meetings of medical organizations. Nor are medical associations the only arena of such discussions. Perhaps they are quite as frequent in the meetings of Labour organizations though no doubt the point of view of the speakers is somewhat different.

RICH AND POOR

At present the very rich and the very poor command the best medical skill, resource and learning among us. The richest in the land can pay for it all, and in our hospitals, which are, as it were, the flower of Christian kindness and of the desire of the community to carry out the Golden Rule, the poorest receive, from the same doctors and nurses, and under the same roof, everything that can be given to the richest, except some things which are really superfluities so far as health and life are concerned.

THE MIDDLE CLASS

But the great Middle Class, as they are called—far more numerous than either of the other two—they do not fare so well. Yet it is from their taxes that Hospitals are chiefly maintained, though many noble benefactions have been made to Canadian Hospitals from large Canadian fortunes, and without such gifts we could not have had the Hospitals whose doors stand open to receive the sick in all our cities and towns.

THE GENERAL PRACTITIONER

In his recent book on "The Future of Medicine," Sir James MacKenzie points out that the future of medicine lies with the general practitioner, that the medical schools exist to train the general practitioner and that, since no one can teach what he has not learned, all the teachers in a University Medical School or Faculty (and there should be no other kind of Medical School), must be, first and foremost, general practitioners themselves, and not, as is sometimes the case now, persons whose interests and training have been confined within the four walls of a laboratory. Laboratory work is important. Sir James MacKenzie himself attaches great importance to the Laboratory, and pays tribute to it.

A NOTABLE EXAMPLE

His own career is a notable example of the truth of his theory. He was a general practitioner at Burnley, a small country place. He had an original mind. He loved to investigate and try for himself. He devoted himself to the study of Cardiac disease. He himself has advanced our real knowledge of the cause, prevention and cure of Cardiac disease more in this generation than the whole profession did in many generations before. Because he had this knowledge, many turned to him for light and leading, and not in vain.

Called out of his obscurity, he has pursued his labours at St. Andrew's and elsewhere, under conditions that were more favourable in some ways to his work.

THE SPECIALIST

He has shown us again what we knew before, that the work of Specialists in Medicine and Surgery is very important, but that before you can be a true Specialist in anything, you must be an experienced and successful general practitioner and that at the foundation of all medical work worthy of the name is the general practitioner. A doctor must be, as part of his training, fitted for the work of a general practitioner.

THE CURE OF DISEASE

In the Dark Ages Medical practice began with the idea of curing disease. That was the duty of the "Medicine Man." But even in the darkness of the Dark Ages there shone a gleam of the idea that the "Medicine man" should prevent disease—he should keep people well. He should frighten away, with noise and tumult, the evil spirits who brought disease.

DEPARTMENTS OF HEALTH

That idea has now developed greatly and has established our Departments of Health, and other great organizations to prevent the causation and spread of disease. Some among the newest of these have gone far in this direction. For example, in our sister Dominion of New Zealand there was "The Public Health Act of 1908"—a modern and progressive measure. It was superseded on January 1, 1921, by "The Health Act," under which the "Minister of Public Health" in the government became "The Minister of Health" and the Department of State became "The Department of Health," organized under seven Divisions as follows: 1. Public Hygiene, 2. Hospitals, 3. Nursing, 4. School Hygiene, 5. Dental Hygiene, 6. Child Welfare, 7. Maori Hygiene.

THE CANADIAN DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH

The Dominion of New Zealand, as we all know, is looked upon as the home of advanced democracy and it is interesting to compare the duties of the Minister of Health in the Dominion of Canada and the Department of Health over which he presides, in accordance with the "Department of Health Act" of June 6th, 1920, with the above legislation and organization.

The greatest difference of course, arises from the fact that in the Dominion of Canada we have a Confederation of nine Sovereign Provinces, each of which controls and regulates matters relating to Public Health within its own borders.

SOCIALIZING MEDICINE

Some of our American friends under the leadership of physicians, are making a study of "Socializing Medicine." Socializing Medicine appears to mean the

Pamela Pounce

The girl then flung her arms round the milliner's neck. Sarah was indeed lacking in propriety.

"I'll send back your head. 'Tis as fresh as ever. And thank you a million times. At least I've had a peep into happiness."

It was quite ten days later when Pamela Pounce received an urgent message from Miss Vibart to come and see her after closing hours.

"Mamma and Jane are going out and I shall be quite alone. Do come, I have something so strange to tell you."

Miss Pounce did not need to be bidden twice to such an appointment. Her warm heart had been considerably preoccupied on the subject of the plain Miss Vibart's affairs.

She was shown in, not to the fireless dark slit of a room overlooking the shaft, but to quite a comfortable small bedroom on the street. Sarah, in an elegant white muslin wrapper, sprang up from her writing-table to embrace her friend.

"Yes, yes, look at me!" she cried. "I ain't ashamed of my face to-day. Indeed I quite love it. Oh, I've just been writing to all the dear old people at home, my blessed old nurse and Mrs. Comfit—that's our good housekeeper—to tell them—to tell them my great news! Oh, Pamela, I wanted to tell it by degrees and surprise you, but I can't. Twill out! It is me he wants."

"Mr. W.?"
"My own dear, darling Edward Walsingham, who else? Oh, was there ever such a lucky girl? Oh, Pamela! Here, sit beside me. Let me hold your hand: Let me hold your hand, your warm, dear hand that lifted me up, when I was oh, in such a pit of despond."

The two sat together on the maiden's bed, and Pamela began to cry, as women will, over the tender emotions of the moment.

"I'm as glad, my dear," she said, "as glad as if you'd given me a hundred thousand pounds. Gladder! And how did it come to pass?" she drew her sucking breath of delighted anticipation.

"This morning, the—oh, when I think it was only this morning!—sister being quite unswollen and looking lovelier than ever. Mamma put her into the blue muslin—your blue muslin, you remember it?—and made Meeking do her hair in a new way with a black ribbon bow at the back and little curls, like the Duchess of Devonshire, and oh, sister did look lovely. And just as she was ready, up comes Joe Footman to say the Duchess of Queensberry and Mr. Walsingham was in the withdrawing-room. And Mamma takes sister by the hand and 'Come, child,' says she. 'And if you poke when you come into the room I'll slap you.' Sister does poke sometimes you know. And off they go without so much as a look at me. I'd been helping to dress sister, you see, holding the hairpins and that. And there was I in me old frumpy gown, and I just looked at myself in the glass and I thought: 'You plain thing, how dare you be jealous of beauty, and your own sister, too!' And if you cry, you silly creature, you'll only make yourself plainer, so what's the good of that! And I wouldn't cry, dear. I picked up sister's clothes and was putting them away trying not to think. Oh, trying so hard not to think—of him downstairs, looking worship at Jane, when all at once up comes Joe Footman again. 'And you're to come down, Miss, you're to come down this minute to the withdrawing-room. Her Ladyship has sent for you.' And oh, you'll never believe the dreadful thought that came into my head and how near I was saying I would not obey Mamma, for to tell you the truth I thought she wanted to show off Jane with my plainness. But then I thought, 'Nay, daughters must do as they're bid,' and I set my teeth and down I went, just as I was. Oh, Pamela, such an untidy, ill-dressed poor girl, with a sad pale face! And oh—I can hardly believe it myself—the moment I came into the room up he jumped—yes, he, Mr. W.—and I heard him cry out quite joyfully. 'Ah, I knew I could not be mistaken. Ah, 'tis she, 'tis she indeed!' And then he took both my hands in his and kissed them one after the other very respectfully. And says he, 'Forgive me, Madam, forgive me! Your mother will explain. It has been an absurd misunderstanding. I found a treasure, and I thought I had lost it. Oh, forgive me if I seem too precipitate!' And Jane got up and went to the window and began to tap on the pane, and Mamma and the Duchess looked at each other. And the Duchess said: 'I congratulate you, Amelia, this is the most crazy bit of good fortune that ever befell a mother.' And everything did seem rather crazy, for there was Mamma at one minute looking as if she could kill me and at the next clasping me and calling me her favourite child. And oh," went on the plain Miss Vibart, "it is precipitate, but what does that matter, when we're both so happy? And oh, it seems I must tell you, and 'tis not vanity! that the moment he saw Jane he stared and looked so mortal disappointed and seemed so confused, falling back two steps indeed, instead of coming forward, that the Duchess cried: 'What's the matter with the fellow? Ain't she pretty enough?' And he said: 'This is never the young lady to whom you introduced me at Hampshire House, ma'am. There is some cruel mistake here,' he says. And oh, he said to me, when we were alone together a little while ago that when he saw that empty face—that's what he said—that doll's face, that bit of wax-work, his blood ran cold, and then says he: 'When you came in!—oh dear, I'm not dreaming!—When I saw your charming expressive countenance, full of life and spirit and wit and goodness—he did say that—I could not hold myself back again.' I had to speak at once, lest I lose you again." And now," concluded the future Marchioness, turning her radiant visage upon the milliner, "he's gone to Harborough House to tell his uncle, and Mamma and Jane have gone out to a dinner party, and if you'll help me into my frock, dear—yes, it is one of poor Jane's—I'll be ready for him when he calls back to wish me good night."

CHAPTER IX

IN WHICH MISS PAMELA POUNCE HAS DONE WITH LOVE

PAMELA Pounce was nothing if not a business woman, as her history will have shown. She had not only those valuable intuitions which divine the public taste, she had the still more priceless quality of inspiring it.

Before she had completed her first year with Madame Mirabel, the millinery department had become the mainstay of the house; and Pamela felt herself in a position to hint to her employer how very much more it would be to their mutual advantage that she should be given a proprietary share in the business, than that she should set up for herself.

Set up for herself! The mere thought of such a catastrophe put Madame Mirabel in such a flutter that she had to be revived with ratafia on the spot. There was no concession that she would not have been willing to make to prevent it.

Pamela had prepared a scheme, which was just, fair-minded and practical, like herself. She was willing to invest a thousand pounds for the development of the department, and continue to direct the thriving showroom, if Madame Mirabel would admit her as partner with a right to half profits.

A sketch of an agreement was drafted between them, drawn up by Pamela herself. Fortified by this document she sought her redoubtable aunt.

"Now, Aunt Lydia," said she, "here's the opportunity of your life. You lend me a thousand pounds, and I'll give you ten per cent. for three years and pay you back at the end of it with a bit over. And if I drop down dead between, you can come on Madame Mirabel."

Lydia was no fool. She was as fond of money as only such a nature can be, and had indeed gathered together quite a substantial hoard in her long years of lucrative employment. She made all the difficulties, of course, which the circumstances demanded, but Pamela, who saw the gleam of greed in her eye, knew that her cause was won from the outset.

She good-humouredly consented to sign the stringent document which Lydia thought necessary for her safety; and to obtain Madame Mirabel's signature to it also. The transaction was concluded without much more delay, and Miss Pamela Pounce passed from the position of underling to that of partner.

The matter was, needless to say, kept private between Madame Mirabel and herself. It is never wholesome for the reputation of a business concern to have these conveniences of management discussed; and, for the mere sake of discipline where large numbers are employed and easy jealousies excited, no change affecting authority can be acknowledged.

Miss Smithson and Miss Popple, therefore, while unable to blind themselves to the fact that their aged employer's infatuation for that scheming Miss Pounce was more lamentably evident than ever, still buoyed themselves up with the hope that her true character would be revealed before the eyes of the too-trusting dame.

Miss Sarah Vibart's wedding order; bride and brides-maids hats—Jane was chief bridesmaid, an advertisement which as Pamela herself said, would have been worth paying for ten times over—brought a rush of new clientele to the Bond Street house. Mr. Walsingham's wedding was the event of June—luckily timed before the unexpected death of the Marquis of Harborough—and it is scarcely too much to say that the first thought of every lady of fashion who received a ticket of invitation was: "Pounce shall make me a new hat!"

Lydia, who kept a close tongue where her nest-egg was concerned, began to unbend considerably towards her niece. Nothing succeeds like success. You could scarce have dragged five shillings out of her, had the girl been lingering on at Tabbishaw's, but, as matters stood, my Lady's Abigail felt "warm in her inwards," every time she thought of that thousand pounds which was so likely to bring a blessing upon her high sense of family feeling.

She took to inviting Pamela to a dish of chocolate in the sewing parlour at Hertford Street of a Saturday afternoon, promising her also a plate of those queen cakes "which my Lady's still-room maid do turn out rather well, and which you're so fond of, my dear."

These invitations Pamela accepted with increasing frequency; and if Lydia happened to be washing her Ladyship's best lace caps or ironing out her ribbons, it was only becoming, from a niece to an aunt, that she should lend a hand, particularly considering the money obligations between them.

But Pamela's real reason for presenting herself at Hertford Street lay so deep down that it could scarcely be said that she acknowledged it even to herself.

She was hankering for news of Jocelyn Bellairs; and at last, by an artful twist of the conversation, Miss Lydia was induced to drop a stray word in connection with him: "that rubbish! Her Ladyship had got a place for him at Bristol, with an India merchant," and she hoped to goodness he'd keep steady, and they'd hear no more of him.

That was the first item of information which Pamela gathered for her starving more effective than the dark shades for this uniformity of treatment—and that is especially the case in the nursery, where the whole decorative scheme should have cheerfulness as its motive.

Cleanliness is, naturally, imperative in a child's room: hence the choice of both the floor and its covering must be governed to a great extent by sanitary considerations. A hardwood floor is an excellent beginning—but such a floor should not be polished to the point of dangerous slipperiness in a room wherein the play may become boisterous. For a floor of indifferent quality, a painted finish can often work marvels in point of appearance, and at the same time confer greater ease in maintaining cleanliness. Linoleum conforms both to sanitary and artistic standards—and it can be applied successfully even over an old floor miss" rag rugs are, perhaps, more generally satisfactory.

Wilton or hard-surfaced Brussels rugs are always serviceable and they are obtainable in any number of pleasant colorings and designs. That is true, too, of the reversible Scotch wool rugs which have long been popular. Navajo rugs have durability in their favor: but, to appear at their best, rugs of this striking character demand meticulous care in the preparation of a suitable background. Furthermore, their coloring is, possibly, almost too positive for the room of a very young child; although not inappropriate, say, for the sanctum of a growing boy.

* * *

ELABORATE draperies have no rightful place in the modern nursery. Nothing, indeed, can surpass in Snowy-white walls and cream-white woodwork create a sense of spaciousness in this nursery, where the chief architectural feature is a quaint little fireplace of white-painted brick, surmounted by a simple wooden shelf. Beside the fireplace, that most useful of nursery-equipments, a commodious closet for toys and other paraphernalia, has been installed to promote orderliness of habit. An antique mahogany crib is used with interesting effect and the "hit-and-miss" rag rugs in blues, pinks and yellows are very suitable adjuncts for a room that is wholly suggestive of the Colonial Period.

of poor condition. Whether in solid color in tile pattern or in hardwood effect, linoleum furnishes an excellent background for rugs.

A size that admits of convenient handling and a texture which facilitates tubbings as occasion demands might well be the criterion when selecting the rugs for a nursery. Rag rugs, of course, immediately come to mind—and no other rug could be superior for the purpose; more especially as the range of coloring is as limitless as the variety of size and shape. Occasionally, these rugs show gay little borders of flowers, fruit, birds or animals that are sure to strike a responsive chord in the heart of a child: but, as the use of any of these designs rather precludes the employment of the patterned fabrics which are so deservedly popular for window-draperies, the striped or "hit-anddaintiness and charm the old-time frilly muslin curtains of our grandmother's day. When they are used, inner hangings of a heavier fabric are superfluous. With the straight-hanging glass-curtains of sheer scrim, marquisette or net, which are almost equally popular, valance-topped inner drapes are, however, almost necessary to give just the right finishing touch. In the nursery, they may be of chintz, cretonne, linen, gingham, crepe or toweling—for all of these are washable.

Gingham carrying a rather large check in bright red-and-white is decoratively used for the window-hangings in one nursery where the walls and woodwork are finished in light French gray. Flaunting the ultra-modern love of things Victorian, these curtains are lifted quite above the commonplace by their contrasting bands of shiny black oilcloth which boast an old-fashioned "pinked" edge. Yes: the pinking of an earlier era—even to the tiny eyelets! In another instance, curtains of checked yellow-and-white gingham are banded at the bottom by several narrow bands of brown oilcloth stitched with white and topped by a very shallow shaped-lambrequin of the oilcloth.

'Tis an age of incongruities: for, in addition to its combination with oilcloth, gingham is not infrequently adorned with woollen lace or fringe. A two-inch fringe of yarn in rose, turquoise blue, jade green and mauve is used with telling effect to edge a valance and curtains of rose-and-white plaid gingham intended for a little girl's bedroom. The bedspread, the bureau-cover and the chair-cushions are also of the gingham, fringe-bordered—an interesting arrangement for a room in which the walls are to be hung with a white satin-striped paper, the woodwork and furniture enameled in ivory-white and the floor covered with a two-toned rug of soft grayish-green.

In furnishing a nursery, there are several plans that can be followed—the least troublesome being, of course, to use one of the suites of lilliputian furniture especially designed for the comfort of very small children. And this furniture is wonderfully intriguing—for it is usually as artistic in line as in color. One particularly attractive example is developed along Colonial lines, even to the diminutive four-post bed, and finished in a soft Chinese red enamel, lined in faint yellow. Furniture of this reduced size is, however, so quickly outgrown, that many parents prefer to install larger pieces at the outset. Fortunately, too, by the aid of paint and patience, furniture of quite ordinary type can be transformed into something of real artistic merit. One very interesting nursery has, for instance, been built around once-nondescript furniture which is now resplendent in deep ivory enamel, upon which pert little rabbits are stenciled in black-and-yellow. The walls and the woodwork are creamy-white. A two-toned rug in dull blue lies upon a floor that is painted black and hangings of soft orange, fringed in blue-and-cream, cast a golden radiance over the entire room.

Still another excellent plan is to furnish the nursery with genuine antiques; or, failing in that, with replicas of the small dressers, stands, chairs and bedsteads made for the children of a century ago. Country attics and humble secondhand-shops are alike apt to house these quaint pieces, which were generally built of either cherry or mahogany. Furniture of this type is not available in large quantity—which, naturally, but makes it the more desirable. It is, however, well worth searching for, as its use in a modern nursery imparts much individuality.

And now a word as to the pictures and other accessories which enter into the furnishing of the child's own corner! Remembering the formative period which the small owner will spend within the nursery, is it not apparent that infinite care should be expended upon the selection of every object entering into the equipment of the room? Why, for example, crowd the walls with banal, crudely-colored pictures when splendid reproductions of justly famed works of art are available at modest cost? Why burden every horizontal surface with meaningless bric-a-brac that will create false standards of taste when a few well-chosen ornamental objects are likely to give birth to a real appreciation of the beautiful in the child of to-day who will be to-morrow's adult?

A Bedtime Tale

of grains shot from guns

125 million explosions in each kernel

If you want your child to love whole-grain foods, tell her the story of Puffed Grains.

Invented by Prof. A. P. Anderson. Made to make whole grains enticing and easy to digest.

The grains are sealed in guns, then rolled for an hour in a fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell turns to steam. When the guns are shot the steam explodes. Over 125 million steam explosions occur in every kernel.

The delightful results

Every food cell is thus blasted for easy, complete digestion. Every atom of the whole grain feeds. The grains are puffed to flimsy bubbles, 8 times normal size. And they taste like toasted nuts.

Then the child will want Puffed Wheat in milk at night. And what other dish in all the world would you rather have her eat?

Morning Joys

Puffed rice is the finest cereal dainty breakfast ever brings. Serve with cream and sugar, mix with fruit, or douse with melted butter.

Flimsy, flavory bubble grains. Yet each is a whole grain made wholly digestible.

These are the foods that children love best, and the best foods they can eat. Serve them at all hours, in plenty.

heart. She tried to tell herself what a relief it was not to have him hanging about, and how splendid that he should have work, and how sure she was that he, so clever, would now make a way for himself, even as she had done. But it was poor comfort!

After two Saturdays wasted, she once more heard the beloved name mentioned: this time again in no uncertain tones of condemnation.

My Lady was so put about. Lydia hadn't known her so upset since the day my Lord was took as a highwayman; and she the widow Bellairs and he Denis O'Hara.

"That audacious young villian! He's been making a regular popinjay of himself at Bath. There's my Lady Nan Day, recovering from the measles, writes: 'Your nephew, my dear, your nephew is the rage here; driving the most elegant curricle you ever saw with a pair of bloods, which, my Philip says, make his mouth water. Has he come into a fortune or not?' writes my Lady Nan—and she was always a spiteful one—for he will need it," says she. "We was all mortal sorry that his horse, what he set such store by, failed at the Spring races." My Lady has wrote to him," pursued Lydia, her green eyes maliciously fixed upon her niece, "to explain, for goodness gracious sake, for unless he's robbed the mail, Lydia," says she, "or been more successful on the highway than my poor Denis—and that was what put it into my head, Pamela, my love—I'm very much afraid," she says, "'tis his master's strong box he's been at, and that will spell prison," she says, "and the name so well known. Oh, the shame of it!"

"Shame indeed!" cried Pamela, her glance flashing back at Lydia's taunt; she knew very well what gave such extra zest to these tales; but she, Pamela, was not one to wear her heart on her sleeve for an old magpie to peck at.

On the following Saturday she saw from the first moment she crossed the threshold that Lydia was big with news, unpleasant enough to make her bursting to tell it.

Pamela was past mistress of exasperating tactics herself, and there was some very pretty fencing between the two, by which Lydia was forced to restrain her old-maidish desire to plant a dagger in the bosom of the younger maid. Pamela had so much to discourse about on the new Turban mode, and the last letter from Madame Eglantine to Madame Mirabel.

"Poor thing, she's in all the states, what with these new dreadful doings and the insolence of the people, and Ildefonse letting his hair grow and going out to clubs o' nights to talk blasphemy. Ugh!" said Pamela, "I never could abide that man." And my Lady Amelia Vibart haggling over the wedding bills, 'twas a scandal! And had Aunt Lydia heard the last horrid tit-bit about my Lord Harborough and Miss Falcon? And wouldn't it be a pity if Mr Walsingham were to miss coming in for the title after all? 'Twas said my Lord Harborough was mad set on marrying her, when there wouldn't be a mite of reason why she shouldn't have a brat to put Mr. W.'s nose out of joint!

Lydia was still seeking for an interval in which to thrust, when My Lady's bell rang with the double pull which indicated that Miss Pounce had better hurry herself, or my Lady would know the reason why.

Pamela smiled to herself as the door was banged behind her Aunt; then she sighed.

Aunt Lydia was a tabby, if ever there was one, but oh, dear, what dreadful bits of tattle was she bound to hear before the evening was out? And oh, dear, what a pity it was that things went so contrary in this world, and that poor girls had hearts at all!

She had hardly had time to pensively nibble through a queen cake—for Pamela was much too sensible to let any sentimentality interfere with her appetite—when Lydia reappeared, and, with much flouncing and head tossing, informed her that, it being a dratted nuisance that people wouldn't mind their own business, it had come to her Ladyship's ears, through Pompey, that Pamela was present in the house. Nothing would serve her Ladyship but that she must come up at once about a "head" for to-night's concert.

Pamela shook the crumbs from her apron and rose with the imperturbable alacrity which it was her pride to bring to all affairs of business.

The day was hot, and My Lady's big bed-chamber a delicious cave of coolness after the highly-elevated atmosphere of Lydia's own parlour. The amber curtains were drawn before the big windows; there was a shining sea of parquet floor on which delicate French furniture made here and there an attractive island. An immense bunch of roses on the spindle-legged dressing-table just caught the breeze from the wide-open window, and wafted fragrance. My Lady herself, extended in a vapour of white muslin on an amber couch, lazily fanning herself, was as agreeable a spectacle as any heated young woman with refined tastes could hope to gaze upon.

"Sit down, Miss Pounce," said Kitty affably. "(Lydia, get out the bandbox with the saffron head.) Now, my dear, good, kind creature, look at it. Yes! I know. 'Tis the sweetest thing I've laid eyes on this season, but conceive my horror, Miss Pounce, when I heard anon that Her Majesty was to be present at the Duchess of Portland's to-night. Conceive my horror! I saw myself with the Queen's eyes! I tell you, Miss Pounce, my days at Court would have been counted."

Here Lydia was heard to murmur, with the familiarity of long service, and a backward scratch at her niece that she was tired telling her Ladyship that the last year's head from Madame Eglantine which her Ladyship had never worn but the once, would be the very thing for her to wear to-night, "and a genteel, tasty, Frenchy confection it was," which her Ladyship wouldn't better not if she ransacked Bond Street.

"I tell you, you perverse piece," cried her mistress, fanning herself with an energy calculated to make even the spectator feel hot, "that turn myself into a frump with a last year's mode, I'll not do, even to please the Queen. Pamela, child, I've set my heart on the saffron head. I vow and protest those gold ospreys with the cluster of saffron roses and the little wreath of green leaves between, I vow and protest 'tis the very dream to go with my India gold-embroidered gown. 'Tis there on the bed, my dear, as fine as a cobweb! There'll not be another like it in the room. And there's never anything so elegant as white and gold of a hot night. With my dark eyes, Pamela, and the gold ospreys—oh, but the gold ospreys, so airy, so fly-away! And Her Majesty who will not even tolerate feathers! I'd have worn my high band of diamonds—pshaw! it grieves me to the very soul! What can you suggest?"

Pamela put her finger to her lip and corrugated her white brow in the profoundest thought. Kitty held her breath as she watched her. The fate of nations might have been hanging between them. Then said the milliner decisively, "I see nothing for it. We can't do it, my Lady. The ospreys will have to go." Then, as Kitty's face fell, she added briskly, "But there! I often say to myself, what seems a trial is a blessing. Why should not your Ladyship set a fashion? It came to me just as I looked at your Ladyship's gown and the fairy elegance of that India embroidery, and your Ladyship wears a wreath so becoming; wouldn't gold grapes and green leaves look tasty, bunches each side

“Surprise Them”
on Thanksgiving

HERE is a new way of serving cranberries for Thanksgiving. It is so luscious and fluffy that I am sure, whenever served, it will be a most pleasing surprise.

It is easily made and a delightful accompaniment to turkey or chicken. I am giving the recipe below, and suggest you clip it out so it will not be forgotten.

CRANBERRY FRAPPE

1/2 Envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine

1 cup cold water

3 cups boiling water

2 1/2 cups sugar

1 quart cranberries

4 tablespoonfuls lemon juice.

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes. Cook cranberries in boiling water until soft; then force through a puree strainer. Add soaked gelatine, sugar and lemon juice, and freeze.

Here, too, is a recipe for a delicious Thanksgiving dessert:

MARSHMALLOW PUDDING

1/2 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine

1/4 cup cold water

3/4 cup boiling water

1 cup sugar

1 1/2 teaspoon vanilla

1 tablespoonful lemon juice

Macaroons or chopped nuts

Whites of three eggs

Pinch of salt

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes, dissolve in boiling water, add sugar and as soon as dissolved set bowl containing mixture in pan of ice water; then add whites of eggs (well beaten) and flavoring; beat all together until mixture thickens. Turn into shallow pan, first dipped in cold water, and let stand until thoroughly chilled. Remove from pan and cut in pieces the size and shape of marshmallows; roll in macaroons, which have been dried and rolled, or in chopped nuts. Serve with plain or whipped cream. Mixture may be divided, flavoring half with lemon and whipping two squares melted chocolate into the other.

Other suggestions for Thanksgiving Desserts and Salads are—Nut Frappe, Marshmallow Cream, Angel Parfait, Pineapple Mousse, Chocolate Sponge, Royal Pudding, Orange Trifle, Perfection Salad, Luncheon Salad, Jewel Salad, Fruit Salad Supreme.

THESE and many other recipes are found in my books “Dainty Desserts” and “Food Economy.” Sent free for 4c postage and your grocer’s name.

with the di’mond bandeau to draw them together?”

“Pounce, you’re a genius!” Kitty dropped her fan to clap her hands.

At the same moment my Lord came into the room and smiled to see her look so pleased.

“Faith, and I’ve come at the right tick of the clock, I think—morning to you, Miss Pounce. You and my Lady and your fripperies, ’tis the business of the world ain’t it?” He rubbed his hands and hemmed. “By your bright face, I’ve come at the right tick, Kitty, me darling, to ask you for a proof of your good nature.”

“A proof of my good nature, my Lord? So long as ’tis nothing to go against my good sense.”

Kitty was always ready to oblige, in reason, but she had her wits about her.

“Stay, child,” she cried, as Pamela prepared discreetly to withdraw. “It can but take a moment. We must send Pompey for the grapes, to Bond Street, and I vow that no hand but yours shall fasten them in my curls. Your niece will write a note, Lydia, at my escritoire, and see that the black brat runs. They might send a choice of sizes, what think you, Pamela? Oh, what is it, my Lord? You men are so impatient.”

“Why, Kitty,” said her husband, coming close to the sofa, on which his lovely little spouse now sat very straight, gesticulating among the mother-of-pearl shimmer of her cushions. “The matter concerns you, really, more than meself. At least, it concerns your family. Poor young Bellairs has been arrested for debt. Nipped from me very side, my dear, as we came out of the Cocoa Tree together, a while ago, by a rascally pimp!”

“Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs?” Do you refer to Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs?” asked my Lady Kilcroney, becoming rigid.

Pamela’s quill, scratching wildly across a great sheet of paper, was arrested in mid flourish.

There was a small unpleasant pause, broken by a loud sniff from Lydia.

Then my Lady said: “Indeed. I understood the young gentleman was at Bristol.”

My Lord was not misled by the quietness of her tone. “Ah, God help you, Kitty,” he exclaimed, flustered. “Sure you never believed you could keep a lad of that kidney with his nose in a desk? Didn’t he off with himself with his first three months’ salary, and hasn’t his luck been the talk of Bath, barring the let-down of a sorrel filly at the point-to-point? And sure, if it hadn’t been that the dice has been going against him the last three or four days—” he broke off.

Kitty sat like an image of scorn; and my Lord, seeing that his mission did not seem likely to be blessed with success, proceeded in nettled tones:

“The long and the short of it is, I’ve promised Jocelyn we’d see to it. ’Tis only a matter of ninety-seven pound ten, when all is said and done. And that to a lively stableman.”

He drew a crumpled sheet of blue paper from his pocket as he spoke. Kitty unexpectedly stretched out her hand; with a sigh of relief he put it into it.

“I knew you’d be the first to say it ought to be paid, my dearest life.”

“Certainly, it ought to be paid, Denis.”

“You wouldn’t wish the poor dear lad—and him as pleasant over the green cloth as ever I met—to be penned up in the sponging house. Besides which,” added Kilcroney, in imprudent reminiscence, “don’t I know, isn’t it the mischief once you get into one of those holes! ’Tis like a sheep in a ditch: the sky is black with crows after you in a twinkling.”

“Very sad,” said my Lady.

She tendered the blue paper back with an indifferent gesture.

“Have you despatched Pompey, Lydia?”

Lord Kilcroney put his hands behind him.

is a Food for the Seven Ages of Man

From early infancy to old age, Virol is a "building up food." It rescues babies from wasting; protects at the critical school age of growth; makes the weak man strong; fortifies expectant mothers; prolongs youth and vitality into later years.

And Virol does all these things because it contains just those essential food elements which are often lacking in the ordinary diet. They are presented, too, in an easily digestible form, so that Virol is particularly valuable to infants and old people.

"Aren't you afraid of rheumatism, Mrs. Maynard?" I suggested feebly at length. "Those boards are usually damp."

"Rheumatism is the least of my worries," she said very coldly. I realized unhappily that I was making myself thoroughly obnoxious to the lady and wondered vaguely whether John desired to push me off the rail and drown me in three feet of water. He looked that way. We spent an unhappy and uncomfortable half-hour, talking briefly and in a desultory fashion, while they both grew more obviously restless every minute, and I cursed the wayward fate that made me Betty May's unwilling tool. At last Mrs. Maynard stood up, very tall and lovely and scornful in her quaint costume.

"I think I shall go back to the Club-house," she said. "Major, will it be too much trouble for you to escort me?"

"Not at all," I assured her.

"I shall sit here—" said John gloomily, reminding me of the frog footman in Alice in Wonderland. "I shall sit here—"

"Yes, do!" interrupted Mrs. Maynard. "Come along, Major." We walked in silence up the road a little way, and then she started fumbling in her voluminous sleeves.

"I'm afraid I've dropped my hankie," she murmured. "Would you mind running back and getting it for me?"

It is an age-old ruse.

"Oh! John will probably bring it along," I said, aware that I was being very rude.

"But I need it," she protested.

"Have mine!" I produced it promptly. She regarded it with scorn, though it was perfectly clean.

"No, thank you! I'll go back myself then. Please don't bother to come with me."

"Oh, no!" I said hastily. "I couldn't think of letting you. I'll go."

"Thank you! I'll walk on slowly. Probably you'll catch up to me." There was lurking mischief in her voice that made me uneasy. I ran all the way to the boat-house. As I expected, John and I searched thoroughly for a handkerchief, but could find no trace of it. So I ran back again as hard as I could, and came almost to the Club-house before I realized that the lady must have deliberately given me the slip somewhere along the road. I swore. I was hot and sticky and breathless, and my bad knee was beginning to ache. I swore again.

Then I limped angrily to the Pavilion and tried to locate Betty May. The gramophone had been superseded by two boys with banjos accompanied by young Fraser in a large mournful voice, while three pretty kids at the sub-deb. stage sat on the floor, swaying their slim selves in time to their own clapping hands and chanting shrilly. The orchestra broke up in confusion when they saw me, and the dancers stopped.

"Oh, Major darling! Do come and be a trombone! Please!" I shook my head disgustedly.

"You little idiot, Brenda! Have you seen Betty May lately?"

"Not for ages," she chuckled. "Roger Franklyn has been looking for her everywhere too—but she isn't being done this evening. Please be a trombone, Major—or you can be a snare-drum if you would really rather."

"Go to grass!" I told her, and stumped off, followed by shrieks of joyous laughter.

I needed a drink; I needed it badly. So I crossed over to the Club-house and was just walking up the verandah stairs when I met Janet Maynard.

"Have you seen Betty May?" she asked me at once.

"I have not!" I said crossly. She tapped her foot impatiently on the floor, then sat down suddenly in a pretty heap on the top step. She managed that clumsy, outlandish outfit with tantalizing grace.

"Please find her and send her here to me," she commanded. I swallowed hard and went. The verandah is studded with long French windows; I stepped into the

Maybelline

Adds Wonderful Charm, Beauty and Expression to Any Face

More than all else, well defined eyebrows and luxuriant lashes create the beauty and expression of your face. The slight darkening, the accentuation of line and shadow, is the secret. Instantly and unfailingly the eyes appear larger, deeper and more brilliant. "MAYBELLINE" makes scant eyebrows and lashes appear naturally dark, long and luxuriant. Used regularly by beautiful girls and women everywhere. Unlike other preparations, absolutely greaseless, will not spread or smear on the face. Perfectly harmless. Each dainty box contains mirror and brush for applying. Two shades. Brown for Blondes, Black for Brunettes.

At all good Drug and Dept. Stores. Accept only genuine MAYBELLINE and your satisfaction is assured.

reading room and came face to face with Roger Franklyn. I could see the question dawning in his eyes.

"Advance—and give the countersign!" I said sharply.

"Ha! Ha!" he said, (awful ass!), "Military stuff, eh, Major? Have you seen Betty May?"

"Pass, friend!" I said resignedly, "I have not!" He passed expeditiously, and I rang the bell for the steward. I must have that drink. It arrived on a tray, cool and tinkling with ice, and afterwards I felt vastly better. Then I became aware of Betty May's small face peering cautiously into the room.

"Is that imbecile Roger there?" she whispered.

"He was," I told her, "but he 'has went'!" She sank into a chair beside me.

"Did you find them? Tell me about it." I told her as briefly as I could, finishing up with the information that Janet Maynard was on the verandah outside and had asked to see her. Betty May sprang up in the finest tantrum I have seen for a long time.

"She makes me sick!" she said viciously. "I won't go! I know what she wants. She wants to say—'Betty May, dearest you are such an old friend of John's. You must be the first to hear of our happiness. Won't you break the news to the others?'" She mimicked Mrs. Maynard's warm, deep voice. "I know her—I won't go! Oh, Major dear, they are engaged, I know it! What shall I do?"

"Don't jump to conclusions, anyway, Bets," I said. "Suppose you trot out and see what she wants."

"I will not!" said Betty May. "I am going right over to the bench by the tennis court to wait for you. No one will find me there. And you must get hold of John and find out whether they are engaged."

I sighed. "Yes, Betty May," I said meekly. "I was getting used to this sort of thing. She disappeared again, and I stepped onto the verandah. Mrs. Maynard looked up impatiently."

"I thought you were never coming," she said. "Is Betty May there? Wasn't that her voice I heard?"

"No," I said truthfully but confusedly, "She's not there."

"Then it was her voice!" she said, with a woman's confounded perspicacity. "Where has she gone?"

"I haven't the faintest idea," I lied.

"Don't try to lie to me!" she said. I flung out my hands.

"My dear woman," I expostulated, "What reason have you to doubt my word?"

"I'm not your dear woman!" she retorted sharply. "And anybody can tell when a man is lying." I was decidedly nettled.

"But surely I can't be expected to keep an avuncular eye on Betty May all evening?" I defended myself lamely, "She would resent it horribly. I suppose she is somewhere about the place. But I don't know exactly where." Which was true, as far as it went.

"Oh, you blundering man!" she scolded, "And I sent you specially to find her for me. Wouldn't she come?" Confound the woman's insight! I was silent, while she stood at the head of the stairs, frowning perplexedly.

"You interfering old idiot!" she broke out at length. "Just why is this your business anyway? Here I've planned this silly party so carefully—even to considering the stupid old moon—and you blunder in and spoil it all. What are you trying to do?"

"I don't know what you're talking about, Mrs. Maynard," I said, a little coldly, I'm afraid. The woman needn't discuss her schemes with me. "I don't understand at all."

"That's just the trouble," she said, "You don't understand. Now I can't find either of them, and everything is ruined." There was almost a sob in her voice. "Oh, I wish those silly infants would stop that fiendish noise! Where is Jack?" So she called him Jack! I maintained a discreet silence. She raised her voice a little and called softly—

"Ja-ack! Oh, Ja-ack!" But there was no answer. She started to walk impatiently up and down the deserted verandah, while I smoked a cigarette and wondered idiotically what it was all about.

"What am I to do now?" she said. "Wait, I suppose." So we waited in impatient silence for a long ten minutes, till suddenly a door slammed somewhere inside the club-house and we both jumped.

* * *

IT was John. I saw him first. He was stamping through the club-house like an angry young Pan, with his handsome face flushed above his scarlet jacket. We heard another door bang, and then Betty May's clear voice.

"No, I won't dance! And I wish you wouldn't follow me all about the place..... No! No! ... Please don't bother me, Roger, I have a beastly head-ache. I'm going upstairs. Go away!" We heard Roger's plaintive, expostulating tenor fade away towards the back of the house, and then Betty May appeared at one of the long windows and peeped out. She caught sight of Janet Maynard at exactly the same instant that that lady saw her. Mrs. Maynard would have spoken, and Betty May turned to fly, when John suddenly appeared again from the lounge and seized Betty May by the hands.

"Where have you been?" he asked. "I've hunted everywhere."

"Where have you been?" she retorted, trying to draw away her hands.

"Looking for you, angel child. Come outside. I want to talk to you."

"I won't go outside," said Betty May. "I don't want to talk to you."

"Please, dearest!" His hand was already on the door. Mrs. Maynard seized my sleeve and dragged me downstairs with more haste than dignity into the shadow of the shrubbery. I reflected resignedly that I had never in my life before been pulled and ordered about by so many women in one evening.

"Now be quiet!" she whispered fiercely. The two young people came out of the house together, arm-in-arm, and wandered down the road towards the boat-house. Betty May's face was cold and averted, but her slim body leaned towards John as a flower towards the sun. Mrs. Maynard laughed softly, and sat down on the lower step. I sat down beside her, still terribly puzzled.

"Those two babies!" she said. "They've given me more trouble!"

"Mrs. Maynard," I said, a great light beginning to dawn on me, "I'm afraid we have all misjudged you horribly." She laughed again, a lovely laugh, like water on a sun-lit shore.

"My dear Major, what does it matter? Those two are happy now. That's the main thing." There was a little wistful note in her voice.

"But why?" I persisted stupidly, "Those two kids are nothing to you."

"Nothing.... nothing but a pair of nice kids," she said, and terribly in love with each other. Though someone had to make that pretty little fool realize it. And Jack knew nothing at all about love-making." She smiled wisely to herself.

"Ah, yes!" I said a little bitterly. "Practise makes perfect, I suppose, in love-making as well as everything else."

"Not a bit of it. A thorough grounding in the theory of the thing does wonders. You see, men always believe in deeds—not words, while girls—young things like Betty May—want words—not deeds. I think Jack will do nicely now. . . I don't expect much further opposition from her. . . A little jealousy is a wholesome thing." There was a pause.

"Happiness is a very rare thing, Major, you know," she said at last.

"I know," I said shortly, "I know!"

"You see," she said, speaking reluctantly, as though trying to fight an overwhelming impulse, "I was married for

Pamela Pounce

"Nay! nay!" cried he, with the uneasy boisterousness of one who would force the issue as a joke. "'Tis your business, me darling."

"I thought you wanted it paid, my Lord?"

"And maybe," cried he, laughing yet more violently, "you think I can pay it?"

He began pulling his pockets out. "Sure that would be the joke entirely! I'm cleaned through. There ain't a single chinker left in my purse, Kitty, and it's the lovely red silk one you made me yourself last Christmas. Troth! I am at this moment what they say Nature abhors—"

"And what's that, Sir?"

"A vacuum, my love," quoth my Lord, with a great guffaw.

Kitty contemplated him a moment, icily. Then she said: "All my sympathies are with Nature."

Kilcroney reddened, shrugged his shoulders, and replacing the linings of his pockets in their normal position, thrust his hands into them, and sauntered out of the room.

There was nothing further to be done; the moment was unpropitious.

Kitty balled the blue sheet with an angry hand, and flung it after him, and Pamela, who had never finished that phrase of directions, rose from the escritoire and picked it up.

The action was performed with so much composure that it seemed but the natural outcome of her good manners.

"Don't give it back to me, child!" exclaimed Kitty with tartness. "Throw it into the waste paper basket. Have you wrote your message?"

Pamela walked back to the writing table.

"I was un-bethinking myself, your Ladyship, that it would be better for me to run back myself, and choose the sprays. Miss Smithson, the person in charge of the office of a Saturday, is that disagreeable, she'd send the wrong sets on purpose. It won't take me half an hour, my Lady."

She tore the sheet she had begun writing upon in two, and dropped it into the elegant little gilt be-ribboned basket which was the repository of my Lady Kilcroney's scraps. She made a brisk curtsy and stepped out of the room.

Even Lydia's sharp eyes failed to perceive that she had not thrown away the livery-man's crumpled account; that she had thrust into her kerchief.

Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs was not destined to spend the Sabbath in a sponging house, for he was released on Saturday night, some one having settled Mr. Thomas Jobbin's livery-stable account, before any other of his creditors had had wind of his arrest.

Now the young gentleman had stepped into liberty in a very bad humour. He had no doubt but that he was once again indebted to my Lady Kilcroney in the matter, but, like many another spendthrift, not having the smallest claim upon her generosity he considered that it ought to be unlimited in his regard, and felt himself injured that it should go no further. He had come to view himself as having a right to a share of old Bellairs's money. Wasn't he, split him, the last of the name? Now, was this a way to treat the only living representative of a Nabob who had left his widow the command of millions? Just the debt writ off, and not a farthing over to jingle in your pocket, or a question what was to become of a fellow! "Never you turn a hair," had said my Lord. "I'll be back again in a jiffy to set you free, and we'll have a jolly night of it while my Lady's at her catterwaul."

He had expected no less of one who, like Denis Kilcroney, was profiting not only of his own uncles' hoard, but of that old gentleman's tactful demise.

But instead of the promised re-appearance a message had been flung in at him, left by a lackey towards seven of the clock; my Lord was mortal sorry, and he sent a bottle of gin and some lemons.

And at ten the prisoner had been told he was free.

Mr. Bellairs had hot blood, and it was all afire. And the mischief was in it that he might not even have the satisfaction of calling out the dashed Irishman for his insolence, since he couldn't help being under an obligation.

He avoided the Cocoa-Tree that evening and plunged into lower haunts, where, not in the very best of company, play ran very nearly as high as at the Mayfair clubs.

He was an audacious, reckless player, but in the main a successful one. To-night there was something almost fantastic in his luck. He went home in the blue of the morning with his pockets full of gold; his resentful mood was rather augmented by his good fortune than otherwise.

Nor was he in a whit better temper when some five hours later he swaggered out into the Green Park, shaven to velvet, his sparrow tail coat, his high close-fitting boots, his tight buckskin breeches and their bunches of ribbon, his short waistcoat, and his big buckled hat the very last thing in manly modes. It was his intention to call upon my Lady Kilcroney in Hertford Street and repay her the paltry ninety-seven pounds ten which stood between him and a meeting with my Lord.

Miss Pamela Pounce, coming from church and stepping in the same direction—she had grown singularly attentive to Aunt Lydia—came plump upon the Beau as their paths converged at the Piccadilly gate. His dark face kindled while her blooming cheek grew pale.

"La, to be sure, sir, who'd ha' thought of meeting you?"

"Why, and is it you, Pamela?"

His eye ran her up and down. She was clad in shimmering blue-lilac taffety, and her wide-brimmed hat, of the kind which Sir Joshua had set the rage, was trimmed with broad silk ribbons of the same shade. She wore a plain muslin kerchief; a black ribbon tied back her unpowdered chestnut curls. She made a very pleasant picture; all, with perfect taste, within a certain modest compass becoming her station.

There was no mistaking the emotion evoked in her by the sight of him. Her breath came quickly; her clear gaze fluttered and fell, and her pallor was succeeded by a flame of carnation.

Now out of the black mood in Mr. Bellairs's soul there flashed an evil fire.

"Of all the meetings in the whole world," cried he, ardently, "there's none could give me half so much joy, my dearest creature. Turn with me. I must speak with you. Nay, Pamela, I vow, I vow, you've not been out of my thoughts this month. Turn and come with me, I say. Let us away under the trees, where we can talk by ourselves. Pamela, dearest Pamela, take my arm. You are more lovely than ever, and I am—I am more headlong in love than ever I was before!"

There was too great a flutter in the girl's soul for her to have her usual cool grip of the situation. An overwhelming tide of happiness lifted her from her mental balance. She could not doubt that, after all these months, it must be a genuine love that lit up his glance, that trembled in his voice and in his touch. She had proved to him, surely, what kind of a girl she was. He must mean the right thing at last, or he would not so whole-heartedly declare himself.

And she had just rendered him a signal service, which (though he could not yet know it), gave her a delightful sense of meeting him on his own level. She was, moreover, in a vastly different position now from that of the mere working milliner. She had resources at her command; a future before her.

And there he was, the dear fellow, and he loved her still! Could a Sunday morning in June hold a more golden bliss?

Pamela Pounce

So she hung on his arm, and listened with parted lips to his raptures, to the fantastic string of plans, the sweet, repeated endearments which poured from his lips. Now that they had met there were to be no more partings. Things were changed. He had plenty of money. Here she looked at him in astonishment, and he drew a handful of gold from his pocket. He was in the Devil's own vein of luck, he told her. He wouldn't listen to her obijuration; he laughed at the admonishing finger. Her assurance that she possessed a safer and more worthy source of wealth he tossed aside as a jest. There was a horse of his booked for Ascot. If she did not romp in with a sweet little cottage at Fulham for them both at her heels! . . .

"Oh, Mr. Bellairs!" Pamela clasped her other hand over his arm. "I could come up and down to business as easy as easy. A cottage with a bit of garden! 'Tis the very thing I've always dreamed of!"

"And I hope you put me in the dream, my lovely girl." He kissed her behind the trunk of a big beech-tree. "Why," cried he, "who'd have thought to find you so sensible all at once?"

It was not, perhaps, so much the words, as the way in which he looked at her after he had kissed her, that opened the sudden gulf before her! She drew back, and stood staring; her face haggard; all the lovely bloom and youthful ecstasy blasted out of it.

Then she said, in a low, strained voice—Pamela went straight to her point, she was not one to cover ugly situations with a mince of words—"You don't mean marriage, then, Mr. Bellairs?"

The ugliness of his mood sprang into naked prominence. He broke into a loud laugh.

"Come, don't play the prude, now! Don't pretend you didn't understand." Then he added, a sort of shame creeping into his accents in spite of himself, "Be sensible, my dear girl. Don't play the fool with our lives again."

He put out his arm again to embrace her, but she struck him a vigorous buffet that sent him staggering from her.

"You've laid a vile trap for me, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, but thank God I didn't fall into it! I see you now as you are, a low, selfish scamp that doesn't think it shame to take his pleasure on other people. You'd drag my good name into the dust with as little concern as you live on my Lady's money. So long as you get your fling you don't care who you rob or what you destroy! Oh, I'm glad to have seen you as you are! And good morning to you, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs, for a very paltry dog!"

She swept him a curtsy which was magnificent in its repudiation. He had a swift vision of her scorching eyes, her scarlet cheeks; she turned and left him, dumbfounded.

"I'm done with love," said Pamela Pounce, to herself. "May I never hear of it, or see it, or touch it again!"

Little did she guess with what overwhelming passion she was very shortly destined to behold the cruel god at work upon another life!

A Matter of Manners

BY A CALIFORNIAN

There is said to be drifting through the American mind today a growing interest in the formularies of social life, and that this interest is broadening and deepening into what threatens to become a real fad. Books on the subject are in demand, some have even made money for the authors, and evidences multiply that more people are reading, studying, and thinking about the subject than ever before. If this is so, it is a good symptom and the fad will be a good thing, for we need to pay more serious attention to our manners, and the best way to accomplish any general result is through some popular craze. It would be a relief if Americans were suddenly to become enamored of proper personal conduct, for they would elevate mere form into an art, and make it the expression of the kindness which distinguishes them among modern peoples. They have heretofore paid scant attention to the forms of deportment merely because they were forms. They have felt that, in the words of the old Gilbert and Sullivan song, "No matter what you do if your heart be true, and his heart was true to Poll." They have been conscious always that their hearts were true, and so were satisfied that their conduct would be; under which assurance they have permitted themselves such nightmare ceremonials as "Mr. Smith, shake hands with Mr. Brown," which is enough to set on edge the teeth of a Winnemucca Piute or a Mexican peon; because Mr. Smith may not wish to shake hands with any one, and may have a particular dread of any personal contact whatever with the aforesaid Brown, a sentiment which Brown may reciprocate. As a people we appear to have missed altogether the important fact that the rigid daily and hourly observance of form is in itself an invaluable discipline which strengthens men instead of weakening them, elevating self-respect and sterling character for the work it has to do. What other equally valuable function has military ceremonial; the salute, the drills, the manual of arms? These bring men into a frame of mind to act their part as men when the need arises. And any man who is punctilious about his conduct is the stronger for it. That is an individual value. Beyond it, is a social value difficult to overestimate. Good manners are the lubricant of community life. If they mean anything at all they mean the forms under which it has been found most convenient and profitable for human relations to operate. Underlying them is the finest humanity—consideration, kindness, cheerfulness, helpfulness. It is not good manners to drag your personal griefs into your conversation, to the distress of your friends, who can not lighten them. It is not good manners to say or do embarrassing things, and hence as we have no knowledge just what things may at times be embarrassing it is bad manners to make personal remarks, unless they are called for by some particular and beneficial purpose. It is not good manners to do things that are vulgar, and make your friends ashamed. Of such are the principles of proper personal conduct; and it can not be dispensed with in any order of society if that order is to do its work smoothly. Even Nigger Jim and Huckleberry Finn on the raft in the Mississippi had need of it, and Jim justly complained of the practical joke Huck played on him, which wrung his heart with dread and "threw dirt in the face of a friend." It is not good manners to play practical jokes, unless they be very innocent and friendly and conceived in real kindness.

Active Interference

eight years to a man I didn't—love. It—it wasn't a very happy experience. Something about the sudden tragic hardening of her beautiful profile told me a great deal more than her brief confession.

"Then," I said slowly, "You are a very wonderful woman."

"Isn't it better to help when I can?"

"Yes," I admitted, "Infinitely better. But not very usual. But you mustn't think that love has passed you by. Someday the right man will come along!"

"My dear Major! I shan't marry again. I know that."

"Why not?" I persisted. I had to say something, idiot that I always am.

"Because," she told me lightly, "The right man has come along and he's not a marrying sort of person!"

"Then he is an utter ass!" I said with some heat, unaccountably annoyed by her admission.

"He is that!" she said, and then to my utter consternation she stood up and ran a caressing hand through my confounded curls. Then she moved swiftly away—so swiftly that I had barely time to catch at and hold one slender wrist. I stood up too and drew her closer to me.

"Why?" I stammered again. "But why?"

"Because you are such a dear old—utter ass!" she said. She was actually laughing at me, but her eyes were very dark in the moonlight.

"Janet—" I said, "Janet, will you marry me? Will you?"

"Why?—but why?" she mocked me.

"Because—" Well, I told her why, though I had only discovered it myself that moment, and I convinced her. But she still laughed at me.

"I think it would be a very suitable match, don't you? Two such staid old people!"

"Janet Maynard!" I said firmly. "Janet dearest! I will show you whether I am a staid old person!" And I did.

organization of medical work, if possible, so that no one in the community shall suffer from the want of adequate medical service and yet the members of the Medical profession shall not be robbed or oppressed by being "socialized."

WATCH THE RESULTS

The Rockefeller Foundation, the American Red Cross and other organizations are financing some of these investigations and experiments, the results of which will be watched with great interest. But the question will take "a deal of thinking."

WHAT WE HAVE NOW

As one American authority says: "We find in every community many medical men performing a noble service under a tremendous burden."

There is scarcely an American community without its old family physician, interested in all good movements, trusted with leadership in all vital matters, struggling along in poverty, concerned only with his obligations and opportunities for service and self-sacrifice. His example brings us to a realization that these limitations upon practical medical science, while they represent just grievances, are equally significant in reflecting the glories of the profession."

HEALTH

To cure disease—to prevent disease. Both good—and both necessary. But there is a better way which is to "create health" as it were. And this is the future of medicine.

When you haven't met for a long time, both naturally wonder what changes Time has wrought. Keep that schoolgirl complexion and he will say the years have left you unchanged.

Still—That Schoolgirl Complexion

Cosmetics of Cleopatra

Whatever unguents, rouge and powder the queen of beauty used, cleansing with palm and olive oils was a daily rite.

When must beauty cease? Never if you know how to keep it. The charm of beautiful maturity may rival that of early youth if wholesome, ever alluring freshness is not allowed to fade.

A firm, fine skin, smooth and free from blemishes, makes every woman seem young. Every woman can have such a complexion—the secret is simple, the means within the reach of all.

Cleopatra kept her youth

She reached the height of her fame and beauty when some women imagine they must fade and grow old, keeping her youthful charms and freshness by the same simple means we recommend.

Cosmetic cleanliness was a daily rite, and the cleansers employed were palm and olive oils. This kept her complexion fresh and smooth, stimulated to healthful functioning.

Most facial disfigurements result from clogging accumulations which collect on the skin, fill up the pores and cause coarseness, blackheads and blotches. Wash your face every day and these ills won't afflict you.

Use gentle means

The kind of washing we mean is gentle, soothing, cleansing with the modern blend of palm and olive oils.

Its action is mild and the profuse creamy lather seems lotion-like. It leaves the skin wonderfully smooth and fresh while removing every trace of soil.

Such cleansing is most beneficial and prepares the skin for cold cream if you need it and the touch of rouge and powder most women use.

Neck, arms and shoulders should receive the same beautifying treatment, for they are as conspicuous as the face for complexion beauty or the lack of it.

Use Palmolive for bathing and let it do for your body what it does for your face. The price allows it.

Yours for 10 cents

This modest sum is possible through gigantic production which keeps the Palmolive factories working day and night and the importation of the bland, mild oils in tremendous volume.

Thus this finest facial soap, which if made in small quantities would cost at least 25c, is offered at the price of ordinary soap.

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE months have gone quickly, after all, even when in midwinter the stretch to next Christmas seems so long:—and here we are, once more, ready to hang up the Christmas stocking and to wish you all the happiness of a Yuletide season and none of the after-Christmas indigestion. There are delectable dishes for you in this month's JOURNAL. Of course things to eat are of great importance in these December weeks and so Miss McNally tells you of Christmas cakes and puddings:—to say nothing of the candies. Then the Family Physician comes along and says the wisest and most sympathetic things about the season and its observance:—not taking the fun out of Christmas, but keeping the health there, as well.

In fiction we are coming bravely along with that thrilling tale, "Pamela Pounce," and we also have for your holiday enjoyment such stories as will make you want to read them twice. "Homeward Bound" by Robert Baggart (R. B. Y. Scott) is the story which won the prize, offered by the Women's Canadian Club of Toronto. "The Echo" is by an Ontario writer, and "Mrs. Villier's Forerunner" is by our old friend, Miss Christina Frame of Victoria, British Columbia.

Among the changes in the coming year will be one in our Fashion Service Department. We have recently concluded arrangements with The Designer Publishing Company, Inc., 470 Wellington Street West, Toronto, which contemplate a Fashion Service featuring exclusively the famous Standard-Designer styles. The Designer Publishing Company Inc. have large offices in Paris, New York, Boston, Chicago, Toronto, St. Louis, San Francisco and Atlanta. There are over one thousand representative stores in the Dominion alone, where your requirements in Standard-Designer Patterns may be obtained.

Pursuing our recognized policy of always seeking the best in the interests of our readers, we have, after careful consideration and thorough investigation made this important change in respect of our Fashion Service. We have concluded the arrangements referred to because we consider Standard-Designer Patterns unqualifiedly the best available. Among America's most valued assistants to home dressmaking, Standard-Designer patterns excel in smartness of styles, accuracy of measurements, simplicity of application and use. With every pattern is enclosed an individual instruction chart—The Belrobe, a new and added service—an exclusive feature obtainable only with Standard-Designer Patterns. How to use materials with maximum economy and effectiveness, is told in pictures—simpler than words—that show you exactly how to recreate the style and finish achieved by the professional couturier, how in effect to double your clothes allowance. The Belrobe Method makes the inexperienced woman successful and proud of her work and even for the experienced this picture guide means a saving of time and material and the insurance of a Parisian charm rarely achieved.

So, you may rest assured that the Fashion Service is doing its best to help you with the gown, the coat and the frock for the Small Person, so that the sartorial needs of the household may be met. Elsewhere in this issue will be found further information about the Belrobe.

Of course, you are wondering what to give and you are even reflecting on what you may receive. In our columns this month there is an abundance of advice concerning every imaginable gift, from a phonograph to a needle-case. Mr. Hector Charlesworth has been persuaded to be entirely practical and tell us how musical gifts may add harmony to the household. Miss Storey tells of the many attractive things in what we wear which may gratify the heart on Christmas morning. There will be found a variety of dainty trifles in the Vanity Box which ought to brighten the dressing table and make more beautiful the girl who sits before the mirror for just "so many" minutes a day. In all this advice, you will find the invariable counsel to consult the taste of him—or of her—for whom the gift is intended. Thus you may avoid the blunder of the lady whose husband's sorrow is described in the lines:

There was an old man with a beard
Who said, "It is just as I feared;
My wife went to buy
A bright Christmas tie,
And that's why I'm raising this beard."

There is, in fact, an assurance that, if you will only follow the advice of the JOURNAL friends, you will find your Christmas giving an unqualified success.

For washing-machine use, chip Fels-Naptha directly into the machine (see illustration) or, as some women prefer, make a soap-paste, by dissolving a bar of Fels-Naptha in a half-gallon of warm water.

Give your washing-machine the benefit of naptha

Real naptha—that marvelous dirt-loosener used by professional dry-cleaners—cannot be obtained in prepared-flake form. The only way, therefore, to give your washing-machine the benefit of naptha is to make your own Fels-Naptha flakes (or soap-paste) as needed, on washday. Do this for cleaner clothes.

Wet the clothes; and either shave the Fels-Naptha directly into the washing-machine, or make a soap paste (using your usual amount of soap); let them soak a few minutes.

The real naptha will go through every thread, loosen the dirt for the sudsy water to flush away, then vanish—leaving the clothes clean, sweet, sanitary.

No matter how you wash clothes, Fels-Naptha will wash them cleaner, more quickly, safely and thoroughly. For Fels-Naptha is more than soap. It is more than soap and naptha. It is the exclusive Fels-Naptha blend of splendid soap and real naptha in a way that brings out the best in these two great cleaners. Directions inside every wrapper.

TEST Fels-Naptha's wonderful efficiency. Send 2c. in stamps for sample bar. Address Fels-Naptha Soap, Philadelphia.

HOMeward BOUND

By Robert Baggart

Illustrated by E. J. Dinsmore

This story, "Homeward Bound," won the prize of one hundred dollars, awarded by the Women's Canadian Club of Toronto last spring for the best short story sent in by a new writer. The author, Mr. R.B.Y. Scott of Toronto, has chosen the pen name, "Robert Baggart," and has written a story of the sea, one which all our readers will appreciate. Mr. Scott, during the war, had an excellent opportunity of seeing much of ocean adventure.—Editor's Note

IT is a far cry from Buenos Aires to London, and a long tedious voyage in a seven-knot tramp. The crew of the "Dunsmore" were weary, with that weariness which comes to men who spend long periods in close confinement with their fellows. The ceaseless motion of the ship, the endless routine of watch on deck and watch below, held them chafing as prisoners in chains. The meals were bad in the cabin, and worse in the fo'c'stle. The sea-lawyer found a ready audience to hear his grievances. The men were fed-up with the ship. They had signed on two-year Articles, between latitudes unspecified (but with lime-juice in the Tropics). Nearly two years had gone since one fine day, when they had cleared Milford Haven for parts unknown.

One can voyage far in that time, even at seven knots. Gibraltar's precipice had echoed the "Dunsmore's" raucous whistle. Her rusty anchor chain had rattled out in a dozen ports from Rio to Canton. Her iron decks had been hot beneath the feet in the Suez, and slippery with ice around Cape Horn. Ploughing through sluggish seas, loaded to the Plimsoll, or tossing light on the wave-tops, this gypsy of the seas had measured and marked the oceans with the white streak of her log-line. Too slow to run from submarines, and too clumsy to zig-zag, the Admiralty had sent her East out of harm's way. Now, on the first New Year's Eve of peace, the old ship was nearing home.

Home! What a word that is to the sailor! Few know his utter loneliness, serving long months in exile without a word from friends at home. The physical hardships of a sea-faring life are as nothing to this. So "Homeward Bound" is a happy phrase. Men forget to grumble at the steward and the skipper, in the eager anticipation of an early "paying-off." Day by day they watch for the border of home waters, the passing of the Continental ledge, where the sea changes colour from the deep blue of the Atlantic to the gray green of the Channel.

The youngest Ordinary Seaman was lookout in the fo'c'stle head this New Year's Eve. It seemed that the advancing billows were already a lighter green, as the ship plunged into them, head to sea. He staggered as the bow rose abruptly on the breast of a wave, then tottered on tip-toe, as it plunged down into the trough beyond. The wind caught the crests, and drove a stinging spray against his face. Heavy clouds were scudding across the sky. The sea was getting up. It looked like a dirty night, he thought . . .

. . . and this was New Year's Eve . . . he had hoped so much to be home for Christmas . . . his first voyage, only a dog-watch to sea, as the bo'sun said . . . but it was nearly two years, and even now the thought of home was like the dim recollection of life in another world . . .

From the bridge came the sound of a bell, faintly heard above the rush and roar of the sea, and the howl of the wind in the halyards. Mechanically he clanged "eight bells," and turned to see a dark figure in dripping oil-skins climbing the ladder.

"Dirty night, Mac," shouted his relief in his ear. Together they ducked as a great sea smote the bows, and swept the decks with sheets of spray. "That last blasted sea that come aboard come near takin' me with it. The mate ought to rig a life-line aft."

"Oh, I'll hang on to the winch if I do get caught. Mind an' don't get your face wet," and with a laugh the Ordinary Seaman swung down the ladder.

He clutched the rail as the "Dunsmore" dipped into the trough. A great sea towered above him. It struck the bow squarely, with an impact that shook the vessel. In a moment the deck was filled with a roaring, surging mass of sea-water, that seethed with foam as it swept across and poured from the lee scuppers. The sailor made a dash for the nearest winch, balancing himself on the heaving deck. From the port side came a sound of bumping and thumping. Evidently something was adrift. In the darkness, he saw a sudden movement where the life-raft had been secured.

With a muttered curse, the Ordinary Seaman started for the big pontoon, which had broken from its lashings, and was crashing against the bulkhead like a mad thing. Half-way he clung for a moment to the hatch, then made another dash for it. A towering sea rose high above the rail. He staggered and slipped, and at that moment the avalanche of waters was upon him, hurling him forward in its mad rush. With the frenzy of despair he struggled for some hold. His instep struck something hard, painfully—then nothing, nothing but swirling, raging water.

The boy came up spluttering—he coughed and choked as he tried to shout—his throat was full of sea-water. A black shape loomed above him. The mast lights rocked drunkenly as they passed. He screamed in agony, but the swirling winds snatched the breath from his lips, and no one heard. Frantically he strove to divest himself of his oil-skins . . . the heavy sea-boots were dragging him down . . . he could not get them off. The horror of sudden death gripped him—he could not last long like this—he kicked hard, and the boots came off. The ship was gone.

Then for a moment he thought he was seeing things. Over the top of a wave something tumbled and plunged down into the abyss beside him. That blessed raft! He reached out his hand. It was real!

How he got on to it, he never knew. The frail craft seemed trying to tear itself away from him, his clothes were pulling him down, his strength was going. With one last, despairing, convulsive effort he was on, and fell on his face exhausted. Still the seas broke over him, threatening to drown him as he lay. Instinctively he wound his arm through the life-line, and lay still.

HE must have been unconscious for hours. The roar of wind and sea again sounded faintly in his ears—like the hum of a sea-shell, he thought—and dimly, stupidly he wondered why. A violent lurch of the raft smote on his consciousness, and he came to with a jerk.

At that moment the full horror of his situation swept over his soul, as the waves were sweeping over his body. Alone—in the Atlantic—he writhed in agony at the thought—so near home after all his travels—and yet so far—"home"—"home"—he turned the word over on his tongue—he had wanted to be home for Christmas—but this was New Year's Eve, and a dirty night at sea—the angry waves were roaring defiance at the black lowering clouds above—he remembered hearing the parson back home tell of a Man who walked on the waves and stilled the tempest at His word—Oh, that was only a little lake out East somewhere—He lived ashore, like the parson—He never saw a gale on the Western Ocean . . .

But still the seaman heard the echo of a voice, bidding him trust in One who is Lord of Heaven and Earth and Sea, and whom even the winds and the waves obey. And so, after a little, he thought of home, and tried to pray—and again the roar of wind and sea grew faint—

When the sailor awoke, a change had come over the night. There was a big swell still running, but the crests no longer curled and broke, for the wind had died away. The clouds were outlined with a silver fringe, and ever and anon the full moon burst through them in all her glorious beauty. From the height of the moon, he judged it must be close on midnight, and New Year's Eve at that. And always the sea was going down, till presently the raft rose only slowly on the long swell of the restless deep.

A rustle of white water caught the seaman's eye. He watched it curiously, and wondered vaguely why one wave should break and all the rest be calm. There was something there! He raised himself on his elbow, startled. What looked like a long, black mast appeared above the surface. He looked with growing amazement to see another mast-tip—a funnel. Strangely enough, he was not afraid. Slowly, bow first, the weird apparition of a ship, rose from the depths, and lay rocking slightly as the water poured from her decks and rusty sides. A great black smudge of slime marked where she had rested on the ocean bed. A jagged hole at the water-line amidships, showed what had sent her there. From this murky cavern poured dark, ugly water, as if blown out by some mighty rush of air.

The faint, harsh clang of an engine-room telegraph sounded across the waves, and the Ordinary Seaman stared to see the churning water at the stern. As the ship got under way, her helm was put over, and her nose pointed eastward. She would pass close to the raft, he thought, and roused himself to hail. No sound came from his lips, for now he saw what he had not seen before—the crew of the Ghost Ship! All hands on deck—aye, just as when she sank; the captain on the bridge, the wheelsman at the wheel, the gunners at their gun, and fore and aft the seamen leaning on the rails.

And now, as they approached, he noticed a curious thing. Every face was turned in one direction, from which a distant glow shone on their sunken cheeks and hollow eyes. And on each dead face was a look of such yearning, that the seaman turned in the direction in which they seemed to gaze, with their eager, sightless eyes. He looked, and as he looked, he marvelled, for he saw the shores of England! The waves broke at the foot of the cliffs, and beyond was a fair vista of green fields and hedges and white farm-houses. It was a bit of Devon coast he well remembered, and his own heart yearned within him for very homesickness. And then he knew why the dead men gazed with such strange intentness. They, too, were homeward bound!

The ship passed by, a broken life-boat trailing from her davits—and was gone.

But close in her wake followed a sinister shape, a long low thing with a hump, whose bows tossed up small white splashes of foam. A fierce hatred swelled in the seaman's breast as he watched the submarine go by, and he exulted to see the gaping rent in her side, and the mangled wreck of her conning-tower. The narrow deck was crowded with men, who seemed not to notice the steamer just ahead, their enemy. They looked beyond, to where stretched a strip of low, sand-fringed coast-line under a gray sky. It might be anywhere between the Weser and the Elbe. He did not know the German coast. But they did. He saw it in their faces. They, too, were homeward bound!

Now suddenly he became conscious that the channel was full of ships that showed no lights. Tall, square-rigged ships and schooners, frigates and galleons were there, all the ships that had made these waters their grave in a thousand years. And with them were great liners and war-ships of to-day. From one of them came the faint sound of a ship's bell. He counted: "Da-ding, da-ding, da-ding, da-ding." Eight bells! Midnight! Nearly four hours on the raft, the sailor reflected. Lucky the water wasn't cold near the south of England. He half closed his eyes, then opened them wide to see what strange new thing was happening. In all directions he saw sinking ships. Some dipped slowly down, bow first, others stood on end and went suddenly, with a gurgle of waters. In a few moments the sea was deserted. Just then the moon vanished behind a cloud, and all was dark.

* * *

THE Ordinary Seaman started from his swoon in the blinding glare of a searchlight. The sea was getting rough again, and he could make out a dark shape plunging her bows into the sea. There was a distant hail: "Away, life-boat." It seemed but a moment till a white boat with men straining at the oars came into the circle of light, and strong arms dragged him aboard.

He awoke with aching head, to find himself in the sick-bay of a man-of-war. He heard voices at the door. Apparently the speakers were the ship's surgeon and one of the navigating officers.

"Oh, he'll pull through all right," the surgeon was saying, "though he is suffering badly from exposure. He has been raving for hours about dead men and Ghost Ships. But he is quiet now, and—"

"Ghost Ships?" interrupted the navigator; "Ghost Ships, did you say? What did he say about them? He mayn't be so balmy as you think, Doc. There was something queer in the wind last night, old man. Three different ships showing no lights crossed our bows, and I had to go full astern to avoid ramming them. I got so jumpy I was nearly running from the blooming raft, till I got the searchlight on it."

"Away, and turn in, man," rejoined the doctor. "What you need is some sleep. You must get us into port to-morrow, you know."

"Right-o, Doc, but it was a queer night all the same. Makes one think there may be something in the old yarns about strange doings at sea on New Year's Eve."

The Ordinary Seaman smiled to himself, for he had seen more than other men. And strangely enough, he knew more than he had seen. In his mind's eye he looked out over the distant, vast expanse of ocean, and saw the sea-lanes crowded with shipping—and he knew the old year was passing out, and the ships were home-ward bound.

The doctor had said they would be in port to-morrow. A home port! With the thought, the Ordinary Seaman breathed a contented sigh and fell asleep.

AFTER THE FIRST SNOW FALL

This beautiful photograph of a snow-touched stream and its banks is from the studio of Mr. I. T. Parker, High River, Alberta

The evening train whistled. John let his book drop to his knee. His thoughts always wandered back when he heard that sound, or leaped forward as the puffing engines steamed up for the still higher climb

THE ECHO

By Helen Sumner Manson

Illustrated by M. H. Campbell

FAR up in the Canadian Rockies the mining town lay buried, surrounded by snow-capped peaks. A small thing in the midst of nature's silent greatness, but an active thing, active with man made energy, that forced itself into the rock bringing forth the fruits of past ages. A mining town where the rush of cities was unknown, but in its lives were lived, ambitions born, hopes crushed, there were tears and smiles, work and some play.

The main street consisted of a butcher shop, pool-room, the Company's Hotel, Post Office and store, where there was a variety of merchandise for sale. The obliging shelves along the wall, and the boxes under the counter could satisfy almost any demand. The streets branching off to the west were rough and untidy, where rows of small shacks faced each other, the homes, for the most part, of the married men who worked in the mines. To the north the railway ran, taking a sharp curve before it reached the little red station. To the south a swiftly flowing river came rushing down from the mountains, icy cold and pure, to join another flowing from the north.

On the last branching street, at the farthest end, there was a shack a little apart from the others, a well-kept place that seemed to be a home for some one. It looked over the other shacks and down on the small white school house to the south. During the winter months grey smoke curled up from the chimney and a cheery light shone out of the window on dark nights. When summer came and with it the long, long evenings, a man could be seen lounging on the steps sending rings of smoke up into the clear air, while his eyes rested often on the school house between him and the river.

John Morgan lived alone, a friend to every one in the place, but apart from them. He was a big man, used to heavy work, his strength was tremendous, he never wearied, never took a holiday, he seemed fixed like the great mountains about him.

It was the twenty-fourth of November, a cold, dark night, when a fire and a book make the long evenings pass quickly. John was enjoying both, lying back in his big chair, in his comfortable room—essentially so from a man's stand point. Many trophies of the hunt were nailed to the brown painted walls. On either side of the fireplace there were bookshelves, well filled. Not put in neatly, such as the high ones all together, and the low ones finishing the rows, but John knew just where to lay his hand on the one he wanted. A cot by the window was well supplied with cushions, to be used for either heads or heels. Near by a table covered with magazines, stray pipes and books, was often dusty. Bearskin rugs were thrown on the floor, the heads lying flat not mounted to trip the unwary, and over it all the warm glow of the fire, with John's welcome, if any one came to rouse him. The other room was furnished simply; a washstand, an old bureau and a chair. Some books were there also, and usually a pile of magazines stacked up in the corner.

The evening train whistled, John let his book drop to his knee. His thoughts always wandered back when he heard that sound, or leaped forward as the puffing engines steamed up for a still higher climb. How they brought and took away, unconcerned, announcing their approach by long whistles, that echoed and echoed in the valleys and around the mountains, while they remained unimpressed, unresponsive to such trifling sounds. Again the train whistled, it would soon gain in speed and race through the night, faster and faster, on, on over the shining rails into the unknown.

John's thoughts did not follow that soon far distant sound, they drifted back to other days, until a knock, rather timorous, roused him. A sharp bark from the Airedale lying on the rug, brought him to his feet. He walked across the room and opened the door wide. The night was dark, but the light from the lamp streamed out over the frozen ground, and over a boy standing on the step, looking up at him.

"Good evening," John's voice was cordial.

"Good evening," the boy replied. "Come in," John said. "Quiet Victory, down." The dog obeyed but kept a careful watch.

When inside the boy asked:

"Are you Mr. Morgan, Mr. John Morgan?"

"I am," the man answered. "Won't you come to the fire and sit down?"

"Thanks, my hands are cold." He stretched his numb fingers towards the warmth, while Victory sniffed and gave welcome with wagging tail.

John broke the pause:

"Did you just come to town?" he asked.

"Yes, on the last express, after a long trip. I went to the hotel and told them I wanted to see—ah, to see some responsible person to-night. I was directed here. You must wonder who I am and what I want. My name is Robert Pearce." The Robert was boldly spoken, Pearce rather faint. "I want some work."

The man towering above looked keenly at him, a startled expression in his eyes, and wonder. He looked more closely when he heard the name Pearce.

"You say you have come a long distance. From what place?" he asked.

"Toronto, sir," the boy said.

"That is a weary trip. Take off your coat, you must be tired, and perhaps hungry." He looked down kindly on the youth, but beneath seemed strangely upset. "Some coffee, bacon and brown bread, eh? After that we can talk business."

"Thanks awfully, I am tired—and hungry. Couldn't eat much on the train the last day. It seemed queer coming so far." His voice gave a little break.

"Alone all the way?" John asked as he put water on to boil and cut slices of bacon.

"Oh yes, but it's been done before."

"That's so," John answered quietly.

There was not much left of the meal when Robert sat back with a sigh of contentment. The strained expression had gone, he looked ready for his bed.

"How would you like to sleep here, on that cot?" John asked.

"It would suit me fine," the boy smiled up at him.

The man turned to the window, his hand over his eyes. When he spoke his voice was strangely gentle:

"As to work, we'll see about that in the morning. You need rest and sleep now," he said.

"Thanks, thanks awfully," awkwardly the boy held out his hand. It was clasped warmly, firmly.

"I'll look after you," John Morgan said.

A MONTH had passed, it was Christmas Eve. The light from the shack sent its cheery ray over the new fallen snow. John and Rob— he liked that better than Robert—had drawn back from the table, where there remained little of the feast. The day before had been spent in the forest hunting. Preparing and making ready for that dinner had not been the least of the fun for the boy.

The time together had made them fast friends. The city lad had fitted into the customs of the place from the first day. John was able, through the position he held at the mines, to give him work that was healthy and strengthening but not heavy. The boy had never moved from the shack. It was home to him each evening when they returned to their well earned rest. The cot by the window made a comfortable bed on which Rob's tired limbs stretched out until happy, dreamless sleep claimed him.

Christmas Eve, and John Morgan was not alone, but his thoughts were centred on a day long past. Rob lay on a rug in front of the fire, where a crackling pine knot sent out glowing heat. Victory, with her amber eyes on her master, was beside him.

Back into the past John Morgan's thoughts wandered. That night he would make many things clear to Rob—but how commence?

The boy, unconscious of any tumult, lay, content unto his very soul. He started when John's voice roused him.

"I have waited for this evening to have a talk with you Rob," he said. "I want you to know of a great influence that came into my life and changed a raw fool into a man—such as I am."

"Such as you are. Well—" his eyes finished what his tongue failed to do.

"Wait. The picture of myself at about your age is not pleasant. I offer no excuse, just state facts. I was a big uneducated fellow sneering at learning like any fool. The mines had been my education ever since I could remember, with a little reading and writing picked up here and there. No one seemed to belong to me, and I did not belong anywhere in particular. Being strong and healthy I could always find work. The mountains bounded my view at night, the depths of the mine by day. The school house was one of my targets, a teacher the bull's eye. They came and went, each freshman had to endure some mental torture."

"One year the position had been vacant about six months. The youth of the town were running wilder than usual. At last the Company secured another brave adventurer, a woman this time. That only added to the zest. The day she was to arrive, I waited at the station, ready to carry her trunk to the Hotel. I was leaning against a barrel, when far away the whistle of the express told of its approach. I must have looked the part of a villain; unshaved, black from coal dust, high rubber boots, muddy corduroys, a jersey that was once grey; on my head, a greasy fur cap pulled down to my eyebrows. I'd show her a Western miner."

The man stopped speaking.

Rob was standing by the window now. His dark dreamy eyes visioned the description, and at the same time saw the mighty mountains, in the dim light, undisturbed, tremendous in their security.

"Yes I was sure of myself." It was John who spoke, and stupid enough to enjoy anyone's discomfort, especially if I could be the cause of it. Well at last the train was upon us, still whistling and ringing the bell. It was the event of the day, and the trains made quite a Lady Kilcroney (formerly known as the fascinating widow, Kitty Bellairs), secures an appointment as Lady-in-Waiting to Queen Charlotte, wife of George III. This arouses the jealousy of Mrs. Lafone, who tries to injure Kitty, when a friend of the latter, Lady Mandeville, who had been guilty of a youthful folly, appears on the scene. Kitty's loyalty to her repentant friend triumphs, and Queen Charlotte greets her graciously. In the meantime, Lydia Pounce, Lady Kilcroney's own maid, is dismayed by the appearance of her niece, Pamela Pounce, upon the scene. Pamela has been dismissed from the milliner's shop of Madame Eglantine in Paris, because the latter's husband has tried to thrust unwelcome attentions upon her. Pamela enters the service of Mrs. Tabbishaw in London, and, in the course of her duties, comes upon young Jocelyn Bellairs, the nephew of Lady Kilcroney's first husband, who is about to commit suicide in the park. Pamela snatches the pistol, and, to save Jocelyn's honor, gives him the money which Lydia had handed to her to pay Lady Kilcroney's bill with Mrs. Tabbishaw. Kitty, who has been distracted about Jocelyn's threats, is delighted when she finds what Pamela has done and straightway takes her into favor.

Pamela thus obtains a position as head of the millinery in Madame Mirabel's establishment, but is persecuted by the dishonorable attentions of young Bellairs. She is about to elope with him from the Rose Inn when a tragedy in which Lord Sanquhar kills a poor Spaniard and steals the wife, who deserts her child, shocks Pamela and turns her on her Christmas journey home. Sir Jasper Standish, the landlord of the Pounce family, also shows himself a villain, but Pamela defies him. Then Lady Kilcroney tries to make a match between Sir Jasper and Lady Selina Vereker.

Lady Selina discovers Sir Jasper's true character and elopes with Lieutenant Simpson of the Marines. Pamela finds in Miss Sarah Vibart, sister and ugly daughter of La'ly Amelia Vibart, a real friend whom she transforms into a charmingly-dressed belle, when Miss Jane, the young rascal, a pretty shrew, is unable to go to the ball. Sarah captures Mr. Walsingham, the "match of the season," greatly to Lady Amelia's delight. Once more, Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs makes a dishonorable proposal to Pamela, who declared she is "done with love."

CHAPTER X

IN WHICH MISS PAMELA POUNCE SETS THREE BLACK FEATHERS FOR TRAGEDY

MISS Pamela Pounce was in the act of tying on her own hat, in the upper room, preparatory to departure after the day's work, when a breathless junior summoned her.

"There's a young lady below as wants to see you, Miss Pounce, and, la! I think 'tis Miss Falcon!"

Now, Felicity Falcon had recently flashed out upon the London stage with a startling and unexpected splendour that was more like that of a comet than of a star; Miss Farren, Mrs. Siddons, Mrs. Jordan, were for the moment as idols overthrown. The cry was all for Falcon.

Her name was on every man's lips. She was the first excitement of the season; and not the opera, not an oratorio, not a concert, not a rout at Almack's, nor a display at Ranelagh, could be said to offer attraction in comparison to the playhouse which announced the fair Falcon in the night's performance.

On hearing this remarkable name, Pamela paused, her hand on the black velvet string which fastened her simple Dunstable straw under her round, white chin. A play-actress! Many a young person of that profession had Miss Pounce with dignity shown forth already from the doors of this select establishment: "Much regretting, Madame, that there is nothing likely to suit you here."

Heavens, if a Mirabel hat were to be recognised on the boards! But Felicity Falcon? It was only last week that Pamela had wept and trembled, and sucked in breaths of excitement over her "Mrs. Haller." Never had she beheld anything more affecting, more impassioned, soul-stirring, and elegant than that impersonation.

To provide Miss Falcon with a hat in which she would enthral and ravish all London! It was too splendid an opportunity for such an artistic soul as that of Pamela to resist. After hours, too, and the shutters putting up, and no fear of awkward encounters. And if some of her ladies did find it out, why, foh! for one that would be offended, forty would order a hat to the same model.

Pamela flung the Dunstable straw off her chestnut head, and turning with great dignity, "Inform Miss Falcon," said she, "that I will attend her presently."

After a due delay, which she spent in drumming with white fingers on the dressing-table, her eyes lost beyond her own reflection, in a far vision of millinery genius, Madame Mirabel's partner appeared in the empty shop; sedate, her eyebrows well elevated into her white forehead, her hands folded on her trim waistband.

The slender figure in the brown silk cloak turned quickly with a rustle and flutter.

"You was wishful to speak with me, Madam?" questioned Miss Pounce, in her finest business manner.

"I want a hat for to-night, for Lady Teazle—for the third act, for the screen scene. Oh, I want something—"

Miss Pounce raised her hand.

"One moment, Madam."

She gazed at the narrow, pale face, unrouged; the dark, ardent eyes.

"'Tis the most mortal-genteel creature I have ever seen," thought Pamela.

"Not a word, Miss Falcon!" cried she. Then in the tone of a sibyl: "Black and white; or yet all white. But if you listen to me, black and white."

"I've no time to get any new gowns for the part," said Miss Falcon.

She had a slow, musical voice, with a ring in it as of tears never far off, yet never to be shed.

"And if you'll excuse me, Miss," repeated the milliner, "Lady Teazle's not your part, so to speak. Tragedy, that's what you're born to. Oh, your Mrs. Haller!" Pamela drew a sucking breath in reminiscence of last week's thrills.

"There! I'd never ask to enjoy anything more. Cry, I did. I couldn't see out of my two eyes, I vow and protest, when I came forth out of the theatre. But if it's got to be Lady Teazle, Madame, 'tis your one bit of tragedy I'm to dress your head for, as I understand it. And put colour on it—I declare I'd as soon stick a pink rosette on that there goddess with the lamp from Greece his Grace of Hampshire sets so much store by in his hall. Put yourself into white for it, Miss Falcon, and I'll do you a hat that'll show it off and you. When all's said and done, 'twill be a symbol of what an innocent poor young lady you are, so took in by that lying young gentleman, what I'd hiss off the boards every time he shows his vile, deceitful face, if I'd my will! La! men are base creatures," cried Pamela out of her own bitterness. "White for your innocence, and the shadow of my broad brim over your eyes with a toss of white feathers atop, and just three black plumes standing up in the midst of them; the bit of tragedy that has come into your young life; one," said Miss Pounce, "for the horrid danger you've escaped, and one for your poor deceived heart, and one for the remorse, like, over the goodness of that kind Sir Peter, making his will so generous and trusting, for all his ways 'ud be enough to drive any wife out of her wits. Those black feathers," said the girl impressively, "will show you off, Miss Falcon, better than trumpet blasts."

Miss Falcon listened with an odd, abstracted look.

"So you think I'm best in tragedy, do you?" she said, and sighed. "But I don't want to be tragic, I want to be happy." And then: "I'm late!" she cried impetuously. "You'll have to bring me the hat to the theatre. I've scarce the time to get into my clothes."

A handsome private coach, with liveried footmen, was waiting for her at the door, and as Pamela accompanied her to the threshold, the actress looked back over her shoulder with a fugitive smile:

"I'll wear a white satin gown for the screen scene," she said, stepped into the coach, and was whirled away.

Pamela stood looking after her.

"Now who's paying for all that?" the milliner asked herself. "Some very great personage, 'tis well known; for anything more splendid and discreet I never see. Best in tragedy, you poor thing!" The tears rose to Pamela's candid eyes. "Why, 'tis tragedy itself you are already! You so young, with that smile that ought to have warmed a good man's heart! La! if my ladies knew who 'tis I'm going to trim a hat for this minute, and where 'tis I'm to bring it when 'tis done!"

* * *

Pamela Pounce looked about her with shrewd eyes, as she sat, very politely, on the edge of a cane chair in Miss Falcon's dressing-room at Drury Lane. A bandbox at her feet, her hands folded one across the other in her dove-grey lap, she presented the very image of elegant propriety in a doubtful atmosphere. She had not expected to find company in the dressing-room, the play being well started nevertheless, there was a knot of two or three modish-looking individuals who laughed a good deal together, and tapped the lids of their own snuff-boxes and took pinches out of each other's with positively the last thing in flourishes.

The gaunt woman who moved about at the back of the dressing-table, unnecessarily shaking garments, was, of course, the actress's dresser, and a sour piece she was, thought Pamela, who had already refused, with a high air of contempt, this functionary's proposal to leave the bandbox with her. "As if I was come all this way to do porter's work!" thought Miss Pounce, with a toss of her admirably tired head.

Miss Falcon was standing at the door, looking in upon them, before anyone was aware of her presence; then she came forward, followed by a portly, handsome gentleman past middle age, at sight of whom the gossips bowed to a most obsequious depth.

Miss Falcon bore still upon her countenance the humorous peevishness of the character she had just represented.

"Why, how now?" she exclaimed. "Fie, for shame, gentlemen! What are you doing here? If you desire to show me a compliment your place is before the curtain, sirs! Foh! 'Tis a poor compliment to salute an actress in her dressing-room!"

"Why, my dearest creature!" exclaimed the chief of the fops, coming forward, and bowing repeatedly with such an affected parade of courtesy that Pamela's hand itched to box his ears. "I vow and declare we are but mustering all our energies to acclaim you after your great scene! We would not spoil that effect, 'pon our life! Not for a hundred thousand guineas! What's Lady Teazle before the screen scene? No part for your genius, incomparable Falcon!"

"Out with you now, then!" said Miss Falcon. "Good evening, Miss Pounce. Oh, gentlemen, gentlemen, indeed you cannot remain here! Miss Pounce and I have the most important business on hand. La, that bandbox! It is vastly good of you, Miss Pounce. Pray, my Lord, give the gentlemen the lead and take them to their seats!"

"Rat me!" said the spokesman of the fashionable group, looking round with what Pamela thought was a very offensive leer. "If my Lord Harborough sets the example, who are we that we should refuse to follow it? After you, my Lord Marquis."

Pamela had often heard the name of the great Marquis, especially of late, but she had never yet seen him. She now gazed at him with shrewd eyes of disapproval.

"Ah, my Lord, you may have a fine taste in coaches and in the horses to draw them, and a superlative delicate taste in play-actresses, but to my mind 'tis mortal poor taste to be bringing those grey hairs that are under your wig, and an honoured name, and all your privilege to the undoing of one poor girl! You should keep that smile for your grand-nephews—Mr. W.'s brats—you should indeed, my Lord!"

My Lord Harborough raised himself from a profound bow over the hand which Felicity Falcon extended to him in a careless sort of way, more as if she were dropping something out of it than yielding it to his caress. The smile he gave her as he straightened himself was full of ardent admiration. Although he failed to meet with her favour, Pamela could not but admit that he had a very splendid presence and that any woman's head, much less that of a young player on her promotion, might well be turned by receiving attention from such a quarter.

My Lord Marquis now waved the company from the room with a politely compelling gesture, as of a host who bids his guests pass before him; kissed his hand to Miss Falcon, and himself departed.

"Now, my dear girl, my dear girl, the hat!" cried she, turning upon Pamela.

And Pamela had the strange thought that Miss Falcon—even though she had stepped off the boards—had not ceased acting for one single moment, and that no emotion had been more cleverly counterfeited than the playfulness with which she was now herself addressed.

Indeed, when Felicity Falcon first contemplated her countenance in the mirror under that confection in which Miss Pounce considered her own genius had reached its most perfect expression, so deep an air of tragedy spread itself over her features that the sprightly milliner thought in dismay, "Heaven be good to me; to see her one would think my lovely feathers were crowning a hearse!"

But as if she guessed her companion's thoughts, the play-actress instantly resumed a jocund air, and, twisting her head from side to side, treated her own reflection to smiles of different meanings, as though testing their effect; mischief, archness, innocent mirth, mockery, melancholy, chased each other across her fair countenance like shadows over a pool, and in each Miss Pounce could have cried out to her to stay it, vowing that she was more perfect in it than the last.

Indeed, the delicate loveliness set in the flying powdered curls, crowned with the soft splendour of the feathers, marked, so to speak, by the three notes of black, was a vision worth gazing upon. The sheen of the white satin she had chosen for her robe flung up the ivory of her shoulders and throat. Miss Pounce almost regretted to see the obligatory smear of rouge put on each pale cheek; by which, however, the lily fairness gained something exotic, feverish, that seemed to match very well with the swift passion of her art.

"It'll be such a Lady Teazle as never was," thought the milliner; and was wondering whether she could yet find a seat for herself in the theatre, when, turning suddenly dark, haunted eyes upon her, Miss Falcon said like a child:

"Oh, do let me find you here when I come back, you kind thing!" and, without giving Madame Mirabel's head woman time to reply, she added: "I know you will," and whisked back to the dressing-table.

Her hand hovered over a closed jewel-case, then, shrugging her shoulders, she drew out a string of pearls and clasped it round her throat.

* * *

It was strange for Pamela presently to sit alone in the little dressing-room and think of the mimic play of emotion, clash of passion and interest that was enthralling so many scores of spectators within a few yards of her; to think, too, of that drama of real life, so sad and shameful, of which she had unexpectedly become a witness.

It was contrary to her vivacious nature to sit, unoccupied and in patience, while the world swept on its way, but to-night she had much to engross her thoughts. All she had seen pointed to courses which, to her straight judgment, could not but appear as evil. Yet if ever, thought Pamela Pounce, there was delicacy and purity stamped on a human countenance, it ever noble pride, it was on the face of the young play-actress.

"Why did she ask me to remain?" puzzled the girl. "If my Lord Harborough is her protector, as he seems to be, what does she want with a poor, honest milliner? Oh, la! to see her, so beautiful, with them pearls, and to know what it means, I could fair cry!"

Miss Falcon's dresser came rushing in, declaring that there never had been such a success as the new Lady Teazle; that the house had had her out again and again. "And, oh, my goodness, the shouts and claps and nose-gays flying! What a pity Miss had not been in the gallery!"

Before Pamela had time to reply Miss Falcon herself, accompanied by a very conspicuous group of admirers, returned to her dressing-room. Her flush outdid the rouge, her eyes flashed. The tips of her taper fingers rested on Lord Harborough's wrist, and he came in leading her with an air as though her triumph belonged to him. Behind her the sycophants gabbled, "for all the world like father's geese," thought Miss Pounce.

"Oh, my Lord, she is incomparable!" "I do assure you, Miss Falcon, when the screen was knocked down and you stood forth I could have fallen on my knees before you!" "Pon honour! Pon honour, never was acting half so fine!"

The flush was fading, and the fire dying in her gaze as she turned round upon them.

"Pray, gentlemen, you are very kind, but I have to change my gown for the next act. My Lord, bid your friends leave me. And you, too, my Lord."

As bowing, kissing hands, grimacing, jostling against each other, the little knot of gossips withdrew, obedient once more to their patron's wave, he himself lingered. "Felicity," he said, "there never was anyone like you. My dear, you brought the tears to my eyes."

When he released her hand there was a new ring upon it. The donor hurried forth, as if, with the finest tact, to forego gratitude in connection with a trifle, or so Miss Pounce understood his magnificent men.

Felicity gazed at the object on her hand, gave a laugh which rang scornful, dropped the jewel from her on the dressing-table, and sat down before the mirror.

"Now," said she to Pamela, "take off the hat yourself, if you will. My dresser hath so gross a touch. The hat, you know, it has made me to-night. I owe you a vast debt of gratitude. Oh, those black feathers! Your excellent taste, child, gave the note, I do assure you, to my whole rendering. The tragedy, you know, and the innocence, and the remorse."

It seemed to Pamela as if she were mocking herself as she gazed upon her own countenance. She broke off. There was a knock at the door.

"Come in," she cried. And, as a young gentleman in mourning, with a pale face, appeared in the aperture, she went on in an unchanged voice: "How would it be, Miss Pounce, if I were to run a blue ribbon among these curls? 'Twould not come amiss, I think, in the last act, to mark the girlishness of Lady Teazle beside so old a husband. Now, my Lord, pray be quick about your business. I

He had forgotten that there was any witness, save the one who was, at that moment, all the world to him have scarce five minutes to give you! Yes, a blue ribbon, I think. You have such charming fingers, my dear, pray pass it in yourself. Go on, my Lord, I can see you very well in the glass, and sure, besides, I did not promise to look at you, so long as I listen.

"You mean to torture me," said the young man in a low voice.

Had he been on the rack, Pamela thought, glancing compassionately at his reflection, as her hands moved delicately in the actress's tresses, he could scarce have had a greater air of suffering.

"Pho!" cried Miss Falcon. ("Is not that a trifle too forward, Miss Pounce?") "Pray, my Lord, remember, this interview is none of my seeking."

"I asked to speak with you alone."

"Ah, but I did not promise you that! Say out, or keep silence, it matters nothing to me."

"I begin to believe what I have heard," he exclaimed hoarsely.

Her eye flashed lightning at his image in the glass.

"Indeed, my Lord? And that again leaves me indifferent."

But as she spoke she turned round on her chair. What a marvel of loveliness she was, thought the milliner. 'Twas but natural any poor young gentleman that loved her should be distraught upon her. He gazed on her wildly, then broke out, clasping his hands:

"Nay," he cried. "I will not believe it. I will not believe it, unless you tell me yourself. Felicity, my father is dead. I am my own master. Look at me. Behold this black. I came straight—yes, I am not ashamed of it—straight from the closing of my father's grave to offer you my hand and name."

He paused.

"I ought, no doubt, to be overwhelmed at your generosity. A month ago you were no less ardent, if I remember right, in pressing a different proposition," she said very quietly.

Pamela's heart quickened in passionate sympathy. What a world was this for poor girls.

"It's not possible," the young gentleman cried, "that you will carry rancour so far! A month ago I was not a free agent; a month ago I—oh, confusion! You cannot have understood. I—Miss Falcon, I am now Earl Ashmore, and I ask you to become my countess. This is a question of marriage. You cannot thus lightly dismiss so honourable, so respectful an offer!"

"Marriage!" she laughed. "I, too, am a free agent, sir, and I have tasted liberty longer than you. I have no desire to relinquish it."

A moment he stood gazing at her with clenched hands and open mouth, as if unable to grasp the extent of her folly and his own misery. Then he snapped his jaws together and crimsoned to the roots of his lightly powdered hair.

"It's true, then?"

"What is true?"

"What all the world says; that you're my Lord Harborough's—my Lord Harborough's—"

He choked upon the word.

Pamela Pounce held her breath in the dreadful silence that ensued. Then:

"Don't be a foolish lad," said Miss Falcon in a changed kind voice. "One day you'll say, 'Whatever the player woman may have done, she did one good deed to me. She wouldn't marry me when I was fool enough to ask her.'"

Then Felicity turned back to the mirror with a laugh that rang like tinkling icicles, so musical it was, so cold.

The wretched young man cast himself on his knees, lifted his clasped hands and wrung them. He had forgotten that there was any witness, save the one who was, at that moment, all the world to him.

"Felicity, I don't care what you have done—what you are to that bad old man. I will forgive everything. Come to me and be my wife!"

"Now, Bonnets, open the door. Miss Pounce, pray put a hand upon my Lord's elbow and help him to rise. That is the way out, my Lord Ambrose. (I cannot help it. I remember best the name under which you once insulted me.) You forgive me? Had I the time I could laugh. Heavens! But three minutes to get into the paduasoy!"

She did laugh as the young nobleman, a look on his face which struck a kind of terror into Pamela's womanly heart, flung his hands out with a menace and dashed from the room.

"Thank Heaven, the creature's gone!"

Bolt the door, Mrs. Bonnets. I'll have no more visitors till the play's over!"

Pamela Pounce was not bidden remain this time; but she could not bring herself to leave the dressing-room until Miss Falcon's last appearance there. Talk of plays! What a tremendous play she had seen that night. 'Twould be like walking out before the last curtain dropped to go home now.

When the actress returned she was accompanied only by Lord Harborough. As he led her in he looked at her hand.

"I see," he said, "you have not honoured my poor gift."

"My Lord," she said, "I have honoured you sixty-five times with these pearls. Is it not enough? As for rings, there is a slave weight about them. I hate them. But is this really mine? Mine to do as I will with?"

fits your finger! Nay, I will take no refusal. My cloak, Bonnets! La, I am mortal tired. Pray, my Lord, good night. Well, as far as the coach then, but no further. Remember our compact!"

"As far as the coach," said the peer, with his disillusioned smile. "As far as the coach at least, lovely mystery, beautiful secret! Oh, the Medusa head would have been vastly appropriate, I assure you!"

They went forth, and Pamela Pounce stared at her ring. She had never felt, in all her varied energetic existence, thus puzzled and troubled.

"Heaven ha' mercy," she thought, "what a prodigious bit of insolence, to give it to me under his very nose! And, oh, lud, what's a body to think? Will he marry her after all and my poor Miss a hat! You should have seen it! With all your art, you've never dreamt one like it. Eglantine, Eglantine at her best. Paris was stamped all over it. When all is said and done there is naught like the French taste."

"I have always said so, my Lady," responded Miss Pounce, "and there's a case upstairs full of the real Paris modes, of which I'd like your Ladyship to have her pick this moment! Perhaps the last consignment we'll get for goodness knows how long, seeing the trouble over there. Fetched at the Dover coach office by our special messenger not half an hour ago, I do assure your Ladyship."

Pamela could control her voice better than her hands, and the professional patter escaped her almost mechanically.

"But I haven't seen how the capote suits me," protested Nan Day, a little pettishly. "Kitty, what say you? I've been so long in the fields. I was scarce fit to go out in a chair at Bath, so worn was I with the sick-nursing," complained the squire's wife, "I have positively forgot what a fashion looks like. Sister Susan promised to meet me here and advise—not indeed that I care for my Lady Verney's taste. You are ten thousand times better, my dearest Kitty. Pray give me your opinion."

"My love," said Kitty, "in all sober earnest I am too overset to be able to give my mind to it as I ought. That unfortunate young man! It seems Lord Harborough cast him out of her dressing-room last night, and there was a monstrous great scandal at the theatre door. The wretched girl, my Lord Harborough

"And what, my Lady, have you heard of it already?" said a masculine voice behind her. And all started to behold Lord Verney in their midst. "I thought I was the first to have wind of it, coming straight from Brooks's. 'Tis scarce an hour since he was picked up unconscious."

"Never say," cried my Lady Kilcroyne in horror, "that he had so little discretion as to choose a club for such an act."

Lord Verney stared.

"Why, Madame, you speak as if the poor Marquis had had any choice in the matter?"

"The poor Marquis? In Heaven's name, collect your wits. 'Tis not Lord Harborough who has committed suicide?"

"Indeed, my Lady Kilcroyne, the idea is sprung entirely from your own imagination. Lord Harborough's illness is a fit. He had scarce interchanged a few words with a friend in the club room when he groaned and fell forward. Sir Richard Jebb and Dr. Jenner were at once summoned. They could not get the blood to flow. He was still breathing, that was all."

"Well, 'tis another old sinner gone to his account," said Nan Day philosophically. "And Sarah W. is a Marchioness—who'd have thought it? Where is Susan? I'm not sure, Miss Pounce, that I really care for a capote. Could you not let me see some of those French hats you spoke of anon?"

"Ah, Nan, you have indeed sadly lost touch with the world, child! 'Twas a magnificent fine gentleman, a noble patron of literature and art—"

"Ay, and of the stage, by your own showing, Kitty." Nan Day spoke smartly. "Pray, Miss Pounce, did you not hear me?"

Pamela felt sick and faint. She was glad enough of the excuse to crawl away and take a dose of the hartshorn which was kept handy in the workroom in hot weather. When she returned to the showroom to announce that the case was at that moment being opened—her head girl was wrapping all last week's inspirations carefully in tissue for the occasion—she found the company increased by My Lady Verney and Mrs. Lafone, and that well-known personage, Beau Stafford. He was speaking as she entered, and the first words that caught her ear were these:

"I call her Fair Fatality."

Mistress Molly Lafone's shrill accents were then up-lifted.

"Why, Mr. Stafford," though she was sister-in-law to the Beau there was small love lost between them, "granting the suicide—to be sure, the poor young man must have been mad—you cannot hold Miss Falcon responsible for Lord Harborough's seizure."

"You know a good deal, Mistress Molly, but you don't know everything. Young Lord Ashmore attacked the Marquise in the street last night. There was a

Nursery Vigil

By MARY MACDONALD

Lights through the keyhole streaming, passing along the stair;

Whispers and secret rustlings, mystery everywhere. Over the fast-locked door of the room where we may not go,

They have hung a rope of ivy, holly and mistletoe. Bed-time is here already; the bells ring far away; The house is all decked and quiet, waiting for Christmas day;

But the night is very long. . . . There are footsteps now and then,

And people are moving still, though the stable clock struck ten.

Was there a big white clock, and a tower, in Bethlehem,

Where the shepherds went to look, when the angels sang to them?

Was it late like this, and dark, as they came from the frosty hill,

And the sheep ran bleating down, in a line, as they always will?

Perhaps the sheep and the collie had heard what the Angels said:

How a Babe was born in a manger, and laid in a stable bed.

They knew it was Christ, and followed; they worshipped. . . .

I wonder how!

The house is all still and sleepy.

It is nearly Christmas now.

He smiled at each question, and Pamela thought that, for all his fond admiration, there was a sort of contemptuous indulgence lurking in his glance—that he had the air of one who says to himself, "These pretty tricks are known; these charming moods are part of the little game. I have not the enthusiasm of youth, but I have experience, I have toleration, and I have patience!"

"It is an elegant and artistic ring," said Miss Falcon, lifting it to the light of the wax candles which branched from her mirror. "A sapphire, I see, and all chased."

"It was found," said Lord Harborough, "in a Roman tomb. There is not another like it in the world!"

"And what does it represent? Oh, I see snakes about that strange little face!"

"'Tis a Medusa head."

"What?" she cried. "What an ill omen for an actress! How terrible if I were to turn my audience to stone. Fie, I would not keep such a thing about me for the world! Pray, Miss Pounce, will you accept this trifle in memory of our first acquaintance and of, oh, your beautiful hat! How kind of you, dear girl, to stay and see the last of me. Why, it just Sarah and Mr. W. be cut out? She wears his pearls and drives in his coach, and yet withal he's to lead her no further than its door!"

* * *

"'Tis the most dreadful tale, child, that's current," said my Lady Kilcroyne to her friend, Nan Day, as they met in Madame Mirabel's hat shop. "They say my young Lord Ashmore has put an end to himself. I met the Duke of Hampshire anon, and His Grace could scarce speak, so overwhelmed was he. Lord Ashmore's father was his friend and neighbour."

Pamela Pounce put down the dove-coloured capote she had been about to place upon Lady Anne Day's pretty head. She was more affected than her customer, who looked up, knitting her brows vaguely, with small interest in her blue eyes.

"Ashmore?"

"Why, Nan, he that was young Ambrose! A pretty youth, and full of promise. It seems he was mad in love with Falcon the actress. Did you see her Lady Teazle last night? 'Twas a wonder, my love, but a thought too solemn. But, oh, Pounce, child, she had terrible scene between them. Ay, ladies, all on account of that wild bird, the Falcon. Lord Harborough had to call to his footmen—fact, I assure you! Only for the scandal he would have handed his assailant to the watch. 'Twas the shock of hearing of the rash youth's dreadful end, this morning, that has been the death of him. Ay, My Lord Harborough is dead. They were pulling down the blinds of Harborough House as I passed along the Mall."

"Fair Fatality, indeed!" cried Kitty. "And her so young and handsome, and not a six months famous yet."

"Oh, she's a cunning piece!" interposed Molly. "I have heard tales of her ways. They say none knows where she lives, nor where she comes from, nor her real name. She wraps herself in the utmost mystery. Probably," went on the little lady, with her acid titter, "'tis some grocer's daughter! But poor simplicity has no chance, especially with the gentlemen. You must play the romantick."

My Lady Kilcrouney, her fingers to her lips, seemed lost in reflection.

"Was there not a story of a duel, Mr. Stafford?"

"A duel, Madam? Five, to my certain knowledge," asseverated the Beau. "And all with more or less serious results."

"Pshaw, 'tis like an Italian tale of the evil eye!" Nan shuddered. "I'll not go to Drury Lane and come under it, 'tis pos! Pray, Miss Pounce? Oh, no, not green! Green! Am I never to get away from it?"

* * *

Miss Falcon's fame did not suffer from the double tragedy of which she had been so singularly the cause. She withdrew from the programmes for a week after the funerals of the two unfortunate noblemen, and then reappeared, to play to houses more crowded, more enthusiastic than ever. The wild rumours which began to circulate about her only served to increase the public frenzy.

Pamela Pounce, much occupied with the Walsingham mourning, was for some time unable to gratify her desire to see Fair Fatality act once more; a desire which—so far was she from sharing Lady Anne Day's fears—had now indeed become a kind of obsession. When circumstances permitted her at last to indulge herself, she purchased a ticket in the forefront of the gallery, and prepared to enjoy a couple of hours complicated emotion. To her amazement, at the end of the second act a note was handed to her:

"I have just seen your kind face. Will you be a friend to me to-night, and come back with me to my house? If you can do me this favour—my heart tells me you will—meet me at the stage door after the last act."

FELICITY FALCON."

At any time the adventure was one likely to tempt a girl of Pamela's spirit. In present circumstances, wrought to the highest pitch of excitement and interest by the emotions of the drama and the personality of the young play actress, the invitation came to her as the magic fulfilment of a dream. Although never had Miss Falcon's acting been more poignant, more intense in passion and tragedy, the milliner could hardly wait for the drop of the curtain, so eager was she to enter upon what she could not avoid considering the more thrilling drama still.

The crowds that packed the theatre were so immense, and the determination to recall the favourite so obstinate and prolonged, that it was after considerable delay that Pamela found herself at last at the stage door.

An elegant, sober-looking carriage, with servants in dark liveries, stood in waiting, and just behind it a hackney coach.

Miss Falcon, hooded and cloaked, escorted by a group of gentlemen, stepped forward and took her hand.

"I knew you would come," she whispered. Her manner was preoccupied. "This is no place for introductions," she went on, turning to her escort. "Since it must be, let us even start."

"Sheridan," said one who walked in advance of the others, one, indeed, whom the milliner, with a thumping heart, scarce dared recognize as the heir to the throne, "you accompany the ladies."

The two women drew back while he passed somewhat unsteadily out of the theatre, and was, with discreet bows, ushered to his carriage by all the gentlemen of the party, a single member of which then followed him in. The carriage, evidently to order, moved a few paces up the street and again halted, while the hackney was drawn to the door.

Mr. Sheridan, followed by the other gentlemen, now came back. He offered his right arm to Miss Falcon, and, with some exaggeration of ceremony, which his companions seemed to find humorous, his left to Miss Pounce. After he had handed the ladies into the hackney coach, he paused, laughing at the door.

"What address shall I say, sweet Falcon?" He raised his voice, as for the benefit of those behind him. "Now for the great disclosure!" he cried.

Fair Fatality had a cold smile. Pamela could see her face by the light of the links each side of the theatre portals. It was very pale.

"Pray get in, sir," she said; "the man knows his way."

As they drove off Mr. Sheridan rubbed his hands and laughed again.

"To think that I should be sitting vis-a-vis to the fairest intrigue in all London, and actually be going to solve the mystery! Though, to be sure, 'tis no mystery to you, ma'am, I dare swear?"

He looked tentatively at Pamela through the gloom.

They were turning out of a by-street into the main thoroughfare, and Pamela, casting her glance out of the window, was startled, but scarcely surprised, to see that the Prince's carriage was very closely following theirs.

"Why, Pamela, my girl," said the milliner to herself, "little you thought when you set out that you'd perhaps be supping with Royalty! But there's one thing clear. You've got to stand by this poor soul to-night."

Mr. Sheridan did not seem to relish the idea of conversation with Miss Falcon's companion. Pamela, who from the first had fancied that, though carrying his liquor with decorum, he was far from sober, was not sorry to see him fall into a dose. Whether on her side the actress were asleep or not she could not guess, but she never moved nor spoke. The drive was long, and Pamela had lost all sense of district when the coach was pulled up at last. But Mr. Sheridan, waking with a start and looking eagerly about him cried:

"Why, this is the King's Road! I'll be hanged if that's not the lodge of Elm Park House."

"This, sir," said Miss Falcon, "is Mulberry House, my poor abode, to which you are—" she paused, and altered her phrase—"where I am this night privileged to receive you."

Pamela understood she would not bid them welcome. At the same moment the royal carriage halted in its turn; but Miss Falcon, alighting, did not pause to pay the respect etiquette demanded. She pushed open the gate, and went quickly across the flagged courtyard towards the little house which stood square and solid, with pedimented portico, before them.

As Pamela hurried after she saw that a

She flung open the folding doors and pointed into the room revealed with a single magnificent gesture.

With the more readiness, indeed, that at four o'clock this afternoon my reason for wishing to keep my unimportant identity, my unobtrusive abode from the knowledge of the world has ceased to exist—"

She broke off.

Not more intently had the mighty audience hung upon her lips to-night than did now these four, her oddly entertained guests. Pamela's heart beat high. She felt herself as on the very edge of some fathomless chasm of tragedy.

"Your Royal Highness," went on Felicity Falcon, her sweet voice hoarse, "since it is your pleasure to know it, my name is Gwenlian Morgan. I am the wife—" A spasm crossed her face. She caught her breath, and went on: "I married one Evan Morgan, a Welsh preacher. Ours has been a great love; but with him God was always first. He believed he had a call to London. We left the fair hills and our cottage for these dreadful streets. He failed. He fell into a decline. We had hardly any money left. He could work no more, and he would not take charity. I had to earn for him. How? I had to earn much and quickly or he would die. There was only one way, and that way anathema to him. To his pure and lofty mind the stage was always ruin and damnation!"

Again there was a brief silence. The equerry tried to whisper to Mr. Sheridan, but that good-hearted gentleman gave him an angry scowl. The Prince sat breathing hard, his eyes fixed, his mouth slightly open.

"There was but one way in which I could earn much and quickly. I took it. I took it in secret. I began low. Fortune favoured me. I was noticed behind the scenes by one whose notice meant advancement. Yes, sir"—she flashed a dark look at the equerry, who murmured a name—"my Lord Harborough was a generous patron; and then all came easy. At home I had but to lie. Good heavens, how I lied and plotted and contrived and deceived! But what did anything matter? There was no crime save unfaithfulness to my Beloved that I would not have committed for his sake. I told him I had inherited a fortune. I kept him almost from the first in comfort. When I was able to hire this house I told him I had sold out funds to do so. He believed me. He trusted me. He would as soon have thought of doubting an angel, as of doubting me. And so I—hoodwinked him. It was the easier that he had to keep to his bed. My one servant, his nurse, deaf and silent, never pried into my comings and goings. She believed like him, that they were accounted for by the chapel meetings and mission work; by necessary relaxation and repose. I went in and out of this house at night by the mews at the back. No one ever saw me enter. I took care of that. To-day—to-day the doctor came. He filled me with more hope than ever before. 'Take

SINGING CHILDREN

BY M. L. C. PICKTHALL.

(By permission of the publishers, Messrs. McClelland and Stewart, Toronto, from "The Wood Carver's Wife.")

In the streets of Bethlehem sang the children
So merry and so shrill,
"He shall have sweet cedars in his garden
And a house on Hermon Hill.
He shall have the king's daughter for his fellow,
A king's crown to bind upon his head."
And with bracken buds and straw, brown and yellow,
Mary made his bed.

In the streets of Nazareth sang the children
So clearly and so sweet,
"He shall lead us to the spoiling of the nations,
He shall bruise them with his feet.
His standards shall outface the stars for number,
Red as field-lilies when the rains are done."
And Mary heard them singing in her slumber
And woke to kiss her Son.

In the streets of Jerusalem the children
Sang, passing to their play,
"The king's daughter waits in her apparel
All glorious as day.
We charge you, O ye watchmen of your pity Reveal us our beloved, call his name."
And the shadow of a cross beyond the city
Fell softly o'er their game.

In the ways of all the world sing the children,
"We know Him, we have named Him, He is ours,
Like leaves we have fluttered to His shadow,
He has gathered us as flowers.
And when the buds fall all too soon for blossom
And when the play has wearied of its charm,
He bears the tired lambs within His bosom
And the young lambs in His arm."

THE UNEXPECTED

BY JESSIE ALEXANDER

Editor's Note.—We are permitted by the author and by the publishers, Messrs. McClelland and Stewart of Toronto, to publish this chapter from Miss Jessie Alexander's latest book, "Encore."

TO the traveler of dramatic temperament, one of the joys of the road is the surprise that waits "round the corner."

When I start on a journey, I seldom know who will meet me, where I shall stay, or what adventure is in store. On landing, I assume as nearly as possible the look of an unclaimed parcel, "If not called for in ten days, please return." Ten to one, the Reception Committee of one or more, walks up to the tallest and most impressive lady alighting, and inquires politely "Miss Alexander?" When the stranger haughtily disclaims any connection with such a person, the committee disappointedly come down to little me. "You're so much smaller than we expected," they say and the feeling of humble insignificance does not depart, till an appreciative audience reassures one and somebody remarks afterwards, "You look so much taller on the stage."

Sometimes, a longer or shorter drive succeeds the train journey and a motor, in lieu of the high buggy of former years, awaits. En route, you pump the chauffeur as to the ancestry—English, Irish, Scotch, etc., and tastes of the community. "Oh, yes, our town is very critical. We've heard the very best and we know what's what!" "We've had"—and he proceeds to name the list of artists who have set the pace and hints warningly that only the best will pass in these parts. "How many costumes do you wear in an evening?" was one question. "Why, just one evening gown." "Well," (scornfully) "the Comic Singer sometimes wears a dozen." And you know you have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

Sometimes a forlorn, or occasionally, a surprisingly comfortable hotel is your stopping place, but more often, hospitable homes open their doors and hearts of gold uncover their wealth of kindness. A hostess with imagination anticipates every possible need and realizing that you are to be called in time for a very early train in the morning, softens the disagreeable experience by putting a record on the Victrola outside your door, so you open your eyes gently to the mellow tones of a beautiful Contralto singing, "Kathleen Mavourneen, the grey dawn is breaking." By the time she reaches "Kathleen Mavourneen, awake from they slumbers," you are up and smiling at the ingenuity of the alarm-clock substitute. "Oh, hast thou forgotten how soon we must sever; Oh, hast thou forgotten this day we must part? It may be for years and it may be forever!" "It may be" you think, but know that the memory, at least, will remain forever.

Sometimes, a less pleasant experience serves to emphasize the happier occasions. Arriving at a small Ontario village, I was met by no one, and was obliged to follow the directions of the station agent to the house of the Secretary who had written me. "I forgot to tell anyone when you would arrive. No, there's no hotel, you're to stay with Mrs. C—" and forthwith he led me to my temporary home. Entering the dismantled spare room, my hostess apologized: "I should have had the bed made up if I had known when you were coming, but I left the room airing. You see, my father-in-law died in this room three weeks ago and it has been shut up ever since!" When, next morning I arrived at a friend's house in a neighbouring city, she greeted me with, "Why! what's the matter? You look tired to death!" "No wonder!" I sniffed, "I slept in a dead man's bed last night and I didn't sleep a wink!"

It warms the cockles of your heart, when a unique expression of appreciation comes, in the form of a tiny bag containing your concert fee in gold pieces. "What lovely money!" you exclaim and they gild the gold with the speech; "We can't find money good enough to pay for what you've given us."

In the West, an accident had delayed the train for several hours, and it did not arrive till 9:15 P.M. A deputation boarded the train at the junction. "Too bad!" you say. "Of course the concert had to be cancelled." "Not at all! The audience is assembled at the Railway Station and the town band waiting to serenade and escort you to the Hall." Your trunk is carried up to the impromptu dressing room enclosed with white sheets; you make a quick change, and drink a cup of tea without realizing that you are silhouetting a series of shadow pictures for the interested spectators! Next day the local paper states, "Although shaken up by the accident, Miss Alexander was able to appear in six pieces!"

On one of the many occasions when my trunk failed to make connection, I telegraphed home for a second gown with accessories, to be forwarded on a train due at 8.05 P.M. As there was a hotel opposite the Hall, my hostess agreed

Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of them.

I had so completely forgotten the handicap of the trailing robe, that as I left the stage, it tripped me up, and my exit became an acrobatic performance. Shouts of merriment and applause summoned me back, and as I reluctantly faced the audience for the encore, behold two men walking up the centre aisle, bearing aloft the delinquent trunk! When later, I reappeared, rather self-conscious, in my own gown, I shared the laughter of the audience and we were on the most intimate terms for the rest of the evening.

On another occasion, a white and silver gown and white slippers were forthcoming, but alas! The white silk stockings had been omitted. It was seven P.M.

the instep, beckoning the gaze of the audience!

Near a mining district, one Northern village named by thirsty travellers "The Last Chance," because it bordered the "dry" mining area, furnished a mixed audience which crowded the hall. All nationalities were represented and at a point when a man clumped noisily out of the hall, I thought, "Some of these foreigners can't understand much of this programme." A little later he returned and I afterwards learned that he was the pool room proprietor, who finding all his patrons at the concert, went out to close the deserted gaming house.

At a season when fresh eggs were a very scarce commodity, I said to a lady in the country, "I wonder if I could get any new laid eggs to take home?" "I'll ask Mr. L—who is chairman to-night." Mr. L—had none, but during the evening, he unexpectedly announced: "As you can imagine, Miss Alexander needs good nourishment to keep her in shape for such performances as she has given us and she wants some eggs, real country eggs, fresh from the nest. They must be like Caesar's wife, beyond suspicion, and anybody who can supply these and will take them to the G.T.R. train at 9.10 to-morrow morning will be a public benefactor." At the appointed hour, seven egg offerings, varying from two to five dozens, materialized, and with laughing appreciation, I arranged to have them crated and expressed home.

When on a Western tour, a crown tooth showed sudden signs of insecurity. Will it hold till you reach home? you wonder. Alas! Uneasy lies the tooth that wears a crown! You have just announced a humorous number, when crack! down drops the vagrant bicuspid on your busy tongue! In a crisis, the mind works like lightning. Will you frankly remove the tooth with your fingers and lay it down with the other ivories on the key-board of the piano? Will you swallow it, or will you tuck it into the side of your cheek and trust to Providence and a nimble tongue, to take care of it? The last course seems least noticeable.

All through the funny story, you play a game of golf with that unnatural ball. You jab its pivot through your cheek, drive it up to your palate, almost toss it down the long red lane, with an explosive laugh (in an appropriate place in the story) shoot it out towards the front teeth. The game ends and you have won! The audience hasn't the faintest idea that you have been playing a double game. In the dressing-room, you deposit the offending tooth on a programme, and as you return for the encore, say airily to the astonished musicians: "Please mind my tooth till I come back."

"The Treat of the Season.

A Fowl Supper and Jessie Alexander Admission 50 cents."

Thus read a country poster in the good old days before the H.C. of L. invaded Canada. "Yes!" remarked a farmer, "The fowl and you are a grand combination. You draw like a mustard plaster."

"Nowadays, when feed is so high and chickens bring such prices we can't afford to donate them," declared the Ladies' Aid. "It's got to be a Fowl Supper or Jessie Alexander." "I see, then you toss up for it. Heads—the Fowls; Tails—Jessie Alexander?" I ask mischievously.

"No indeed, we don't gamble. We vote on it."

"And I win. I feel quite flattered."

"Well, you're much less trouble. You don't have to be roasted and cut up."

A boys' S. S. class in one of the towns, had embarked on a huge venture by engaging my services. The elders had misgivings, but not so the boys! A girls' class had had Miss Alexander last year and what girls had done, boys could do. Faith and work brought success and a big house, and towards the close of the concert, the chairman of the Boys' Committee addressed the audience. Incidentally, let me say, that I've discovered, that Methodist Class meetings are better training schools for glibness of speech, than any College of Oratory. Up stands this youth, a bit excited but with all his that it would be advisable for me to go there, to be ready to don my frock the instant it arrived; so, clad in a long cloak and borrowed woollen dressing-gown which could be quickly doffed, I waited for the whistle of the train. 8:05—no sound! 8:15—no sign! 8:30—despair! The impatient concert manager demanded my presence at the Hall immediately, "dress or no dress!" My hostess, several sizes larger than I, but willing to "give me the clothes off her back," hastily transferred her black evening gown from her ample shoulders to mine. It swallowed me! We padded, pinned and looped its voluminous folds, and thus attired, I apologized breathlessly to the waiting audience. "I'm so sorry to have kept you waiting, but the train hasn't yet arrived with my evening clothes and I have had to come out in borrowed plumes." I changed my opening number to "The Ruggles's Dinner Party," in which poor Mrs. R— struggles to find costumes for her large family. "She that had sash, had no handkerchief; he that had collar had no necktie . . . but

and not a white stocking within miles! A black isthmus stretched from skirt hem to slippers. That must not be! "Have you an old sheet or pillow-case that you can waste?" I asked. The linen was at once produced, I tore it into bandages and gave first aid to my stockingless ankles. Fortunately the absence of footlights screened the camouflage for me. Bessie Bonsall Barron, contralto, goes me one better on the stocking episode. She was singing in Oratorio in Ottawa and after rehearsal, had only half an hour for dressing. No evening stockings! A maid was bribed to search the Hotel for a pair—with no success. The only substitute obtainable, was a long pair of white woollen sleeves and mittens that were, in desperation, squeezed into the white satin slippers. As the Tenor sang divinely, "Lift up your eyes," the Contralto fervently hoped that the lifted eyes would rise beyond her wool-clad feet. When she crossed the stage to sing a duet with the Tenor, imagine her dismay, to see a waggish woollen thumb protruding from

With a wild gasp of terror her eyes fastened upon the window

Mrs. Villier's Forerunner

By Christina Frame

Illustrated by Maude MacLaren

MRS. Villier was sitting alone by her parlor fire. She was quite oblivious to the December rain beating against the windows, and the weird whistling of the wind around the corners of the old house. Her romance-starved spirit was finding consolation in a pink covered "Family Journal," that lay open on her lap, and her long discipline in thrift was evident also, for she knit as she read.

From the half-open door into the hall came the loud, clear, "tick-tock, tick-tock," of a fine old mahogany clock. So insistent was its note that Mrs. Villier finally got up to investigate.

"Huh," she snapped, as she opened the long door and eyed the weights, "Wong has been winding the clock. I knew it shouldn't be ticking so hard at the end of the week. I'll have to give that Chinaman some further lessons in minding his own business."

The highly polished case of the old clock reflected her spare figure, greying hair, and thin, lined face, and caught too the hard, triumphant light in her blue eyes.

"Sister-in-law, Ethel Maud Bradley Villier didn't succeed in getting you," she chuckled, laying a knucky hand on the shining clock. "She and Thomas were a long way from seeing eye to eye in dividing the Villier heirlooms. Thomas never let anything go out of his keeping that he could hang onto, and now that you're mine, she shall never get hands on you, never! I'm going to do as I please about willing the clock, and the Crown Derby china, and the old mahogany, and silver. They're all mine now. Ethel Maud never dreamed that her rich, paralytic brother-in-law would marry his plain, old maid house-keeper, 'just a common sort, you know,' but you can never tell what a man will do when his comfort is in jeopardy. Thomas must have thought I had earned them or he wouldn't have left everything to me," decided his widow, as she settled down again to the love affairs of Lords and governesses.

The storm was increasing in violence; the wind shrieking through the great trees that surrounded the house, and driving the rain in fierce gusts against the panes, while the long, hollow, boom of surf told of a wild night on the Strait of Juan de Fuca. It was the sort of night that plays havoc with nerves and common sense. Mrs. Villier dropped her knitting and finally laid aside the pink covered "Journal" and gave undivided attention to the racket of the storm.

"Sounds as if there were somebody outside," she murmured, "I think I heard steps, I'm sure I did."

Just at that instant the clock chimed nine, such a homey, every-day sound, that Mrs. Villier at once set to work to combat her Celtic fears of storm omens, warnings, forerunners, and ghosts.

The house was large, and dated from Crown Colony days. On either side of the big front door there was a row of glass panes, and Mrs. Villier suddenly remembered that they were curtainless. Fresh ones for Christmas, were to be hung in the morning.

"Anyone can look right in," it was a thought that sent her at once to close the door leading into the hall. Her hand was on the knob, when, with a wild gasp of terror, her eyes fastened upon the window.

Pressed close against the pane was a young girl's face. A face of haunting beauty, with wide, staring, dark eyes, and little rings of dark, wet curls clustering on a forehead that showed ghastly pale in the bluish light of the new opalescent lamp shade.

"Oh, oh, ohhhh," limp with terror, Mrs. Villier clutched at the door, and in an instant the face vanished.

"Heaven help me, I, I, know that face!" wailed Mrs. Villier. "My soul and body, I've seen a ghost! I've seen a ghost! I have! I have!"

She slammed the door and scuttled back into the chair by the fire. Goose flesh shivers chased down her spine and her teeth chattered as she thought upon the dire significance of her experience.

"It's a forerunner, a forerunner for me," she shuddered, her eyes fixed upon an old fashioned miniature on the mantel. "Yes, that is who it was, the very same face, and eyes, and hair all wet. It was the girl that was coming out from England to marry Thomas, years ago, that was staring in the window at the old clock. She died on the voyage and was buried at sea." Mrs. Villier wrung her hands at the thought of the wet, black draperies of that one who was looking in.

"I wish to mercy I had locked up that picture of her after Thomas died, or had put it out of sight somewhere. I daren't touch it now. O, my soul, to think I've had a warning."

With a frightened gulp she turned her back on the miniature, heaped bark on the fire, substituted "The Psalms of David" for the "Family Journal" and sat down, in figurative sackcloth and ashes, to await the return of Wong, the cook.

She put in a restless, fear-tormented night, a quotation from the story she had been reading flashing insistently through her mind. "I am a doomed woman, a doomed woman."

* * *

THERE was a sudden weather change in the morning, a brisk north wind with a hint of frost in the air, and daylight and sunshine go hand in hand with the blessed normal happenings of every day.

Mrs. Villier's spirits rose as she dressed. "Perhaps it was a neighbour I saw, or maybe I had been dreaming in my chair. No, I did see something looking in at the window, but I'm going to stop thinking about forerunners for I never felt less like dying than I do this morning. I'll get busy with Christmas work, and the first thing I do, will be to give Wong a piece of my mind about meddling with the clock." During the morning she worked with whirlwind energy, Wong's flapping slippers making a frantic accompaniment.

"I don't know who is going to eat all that cake and pastry," she soliloquized, "if Ethel Maud, and George, and the young people were coming to spend Christmas, and running in and out as they used to, it wouldn't last long." Thoughts of the times when Thomas's nephew and nieces made merry in the Villier homestead surged in her memory. The girls were married and far away, and Tom had only been home once since his return from Overseas.

"Perhaps, if I hadn't been away from home just then, Tom might have come to see me, I've always liked Tom." She picked up the morning paper and sat down for a minute. The very first item that her eyes rested upon was to the effect that Major Thomas Villier and bride were spending the Christmas season with the Major's parents at "Cedarhurst."

"Tom's married," murmured Mrs. Villier, "then I needn't look to see him on this trip, a bride is enough to occupy any one mere man's attention, to say nothing of the coolness over the heirlooms."

By the time the noon whistles cut the frosty air, her courage was decidedly on the ebb. She was lonely and tired, and Christmas preparations but a hollow mockery. The face at the window kept returning to her mind with melancholy insistence. "Perhaps she was staring at the clock to warn me of how little time I have left," shuddered Mrs. Villier. "I'm not going to stay here alone this evening anyhow. I'll give Wong the afternoon off instead of the evening, and I'll telephone Agnes McGee to come out in the early 'bus' and stay for tea."

Mrs. McGee arrived according to schedule, the two enjoyed a pleasant, gossipy afternoon and feasted upon Christmas goodies in happy defiance of digestive consequences.

"It's you, Hannah, that's got the well-feathered nest," commented the visitor, as she wiped the heirloom china and old silver. "I won't deny that you earned it, having to wait, day in and day out, on the whims of a paralytic old man, but there are lots of women doing just as hard work and getting nothing but abuse for it. There's Jane McClurg for one, you remember Jane, don't you?"

"Yes, of course."

"Well, Jane is having about the worst time of anyone I know. I said to her yesterday, 'Jane, you look like death, you're killing yourself waiting on that crank of a husband, and the only satisfaction I can see for you is to come back and haunt him.'"

"Haunt him," repeated Mrs. Villier, with a sharp indrawing of breath, "do you believe in ghosts?"

"I certainly do," declared Mrs. McGee, "not that I've ever seen one myself, Heaven preserve me from that. But I know that there are ghosts all right. I've heard my grandfather tell, dozens of times, about the one he saw, it was a forerunner for Bridget Kelly," and Mrs. McGee proceeded to relate a circumstantial story of supernatural visitation. Encouraged by the frightened eagerness with which her listener absorbed the gruesome details, Mrs. McGee added all the ghostly thrillers she knew, and by the time the list was exhausted, had succeeded in thoroughly frightening herself as well as her listener.

Fire-lit dusk had deepened into night during the harrowing recital, and as she finished, Mrs. McGee cast apprehensive

Christmas Dinners of Long Ago

By Myrtle Leeta Cherry

*"Without the door let sorrow lie,
And if, for cold, it hap to die,
We'll bury it in a Christmas pie,
And evermore be merry!"*

ONE sometimes wonders why it is that when we wish to attain the acme of joyousness and the height of celebration, we must, perforce, have a wonderful feast to help us reach our perfect enjoyment! Such, however, is the case, and has been, I suppose, ever since Eve invited Adam to that most exclusive banquet in the Garden of Eden. Especially does this culinary characteristic leap into prominence at Christmas time, when all over the land, for weeks ahead of time, Christmas cakes are being skilfully prominently on any Christmas menu that we have ever seen. Yet these were mere commonplaces in the gustatorial feasts of the brave old days of yore! The turkey, with all his blandishments, was but a mere barnyard fowl, and as such, was made to keep his place,—and incidentally his neck as well!

Imagination loves to picture those Christmas feasts of olden days, when the great Baronial Halls were filled for days and weeks with the gallant knights and "fayre ladyes" whose tinkling merriment and jovial mirth, filled with pleasure the great heart of the Feudal Chieftain, whose guests they were. Scores of retainers and attendants of every sort swarmed everywhere over the grey old castle; and his hands, on a great platter of gold or silver, the Boar's Head, royal emblem that the Christmas feast might now begin. Behind the "Sewer," a chosen company of knights and ladies made up the gay procession, and amid much jollity this wondrous Head was placed before the Lord of the Castle to dispense:—

"Sweet rosemary and bays around it spread,
His foaming tusks with some large pippin graced,
Or midst those thundering spears an orange placed
Sauce, like himself, offensive to his foes,
The roguish mustard, dangerous to the nose."

Next, to the feast, came the beautiful mixed up, Christmas puddings boiled for hours, and jars of spicy mincemeat set aside for the succulent mince-pies of later date.

However, when we read of the brave old days of "Merrie England" and the wondrous feasts at which Ye Noble Lorde presided at Christmas time, we come to the conclusion that we simply do not know how to feast at all in these modern days of ours! We must be losing the fine art of eating, now-a-days, since we consider ourselves quite among the elite, these days, if our harassed pocketbooks can secure the noble turkey to grace our Christmas tables. Of course, we do have a few other knick-knacks tucked in for good measure, most of us, but still the plain fact remains that we certainly are not the artistic "feeders" that our great-great-granddaddies were! Ah! They were the boys who did this feasting business up properly, I can tell you!

For instance, surprisingly few people, now-a-days, would consider inviting their Christmas guests to a feast of stuffed Peacock in all its gorgeousness, nor does the noble Boar's Head figure at all there were jesting, roundelays, and carolling, with the soft breath of romance and the dashing chivalry of gallant cavaliers lending glamour to it all. This merrymaking never lasted for less than a fortnight, and often spread itself over a much longer period than that. But of course the culminating epoch of it all was the wondrous feast of Christmas Day, when the heavy darkness of the oak-panelled walls was lightened by the flare of myriads of candles whose rays were caught and thrown again from the burnished armor hanging on the walls. Blazing fires would flame in the huge stone fireplaces, and down the centre of the Hall, the long oaken refectory table groaning with its load of Christmas cheer, would be surrounded by the wit and nobility, the beauty and grace of the land.

Hush! From out the door comes the jubilant flourish of silver-tongued trumpets; a mingled harmony of merry minstrelsy rises clear on the air; the great doors are flung open wide and a gala procession comes into the Hall. First comes the "Sewer" a noble figure, carrying high in Peacock, and this noble bird was never served by common hands; that privilege was reserved for the lady guest most distinguished by birth or beauty. With her own fair hands she carried the Peacock on its golden dish into the great Hall, heralded by sweet music, and a retinue of lovely maidens following in her train. Sometimes the Master did the carving, but often this honor was given to the noble knight who had been acclaimed victor in the jousts-at-arms.

Most carefully was this proud bird prepared for the feast and a wondrous sight he must have been when placed on the great oaken table. The skin was first carefully stripped off, with the plumage adhering; the bird was then stuffed with spices and sweet herbs, basted with yolk of egg, and very carefully roasted. When properly browned and partially cooled, it was sewed up again in its feathers, its beak gilded, and very often before going to the table, a piece of cotton saturated with spirits was placed in its beak, and lighted before the carver disturbed the whole.

Whenever soap comes into contact with the skin—use Ivory.

Look out! here comes the frost chap!

SOME MOTHERS “wish-there-was-a-Slaw” to keep children from getting dirty when raw winter winds begin to blow!

Chapped hands and faces—how cruelly they hurt! They often result from the extraction of the natural oil from the skin by harsh soap.

Here is one effective way to guard against this possibility.

Let your children wash in Ivory Soap and warm water—not hot—a dozen times a day if need be. Only be sure they dry the skin thoroughly.

Ivory lather, you see, is mild and gentle, and it rinses off easily and completely, leaving the skin clean and smooth and weather-proof.

Your own face and hands, too. After Summer's pleasant warmth, they must get used to Winter's keen blasts. Though your skin be as fine as a baby's, Ivory will help to protect it against Winter's harshness and keep it healthy and soft.

Husbands like Ivory, especially. Men don't enjoy deep-sea diving for soap in a bathtub—Ivory Soap floats!

Wouldn't you like to have, in one soap, all seven of the desirable qualities and properties a fine soap may have—purity, mildness, whiteness, fragrance, abundant lather, easy rinsing, and “it floats”?

Of course you would! And Ivory gives you every one.

WHEN SANTA CLAUS FORGOT

IT was the busiest Christmas eve that Santa Claus had ever known. He had more places to visit than ever before, more chimneys to go down, more presents to carry in his pack, more stockings to fill. He had planned his Christmas journey days before, and was sure that he had not forgotten one home that he should visit.

But even so wise and thoughtful a one as Santa Claus cannot think of everything, and in the hurry and bustle there was one house that he had left out of all his planning.

It was a large, low house, quite a bit back from the road that runs between the two towns.

The tall close-set evergreens almost hid it from view, summer and winter; even the lights from the windows could not find a way through the thick branches. This was the house that Santa Claus forgot. But if Santa Claus forgot that there should be a real Christmas here, there were those in the house itself who remembered and who looked forward to a joyous Christmas morning, Bob, and Beth, and the Baby. Stockings, empty ones, had been hung by the fireplace, and the three little heads were each sure of this—Santa Claus would not fail to fill the stockings.

But, as you know, Santa Claus had forgotten all about this house hidden in the evergreens, and Christmas eve went by, hour by hour, then minute by minute, and there was no sign of any stout, jolly, white-bearded Giftbringer coming down the chimney.

Above the fireplace, by which the stockings hung, a broad mantelpiece shelved widely, and on it, standing in a long row, were the children's favorite books in their coats of leather, of cloth, even of paper, in all colors, with touches of gold and silver on some of them. Until just before twelve o'clock, these books were just tightly-bound paper packs with words and pictures painted on their pages, but—the tall clock in the hall struck twelve, and each book had turned into a house with wonderful people living in every one.

The first book-house at one end of the row had a sign high up on it—"The Three Bears," and just as soon as the clock had stopped striking, out from their book-house walked two big bears and a little one. They were not so very big, for they stood near the edge of the mantelpiece and peered over. The littlest bear, whose name was Tiny, you know, was the first to spy the empty stockings.

"What's this! What's this!" squeaked Tiny. "Christmas is here, and no presents!"

"Something has happened to Santa Claus," growled the biggest bear.

"Maybe he got stuck in a chimney," suggested the bear who was neither the biggest one nor the littlest one.

"It doesn't matter what has happened," said Tiny. "Those stockings must be filled somehow. I'm going to ask Sindbad the Sailor about it."

Saying this the little bear hurried over to another one of the book-houses, and rapped loudly on its cloth-covered door. Almost at once, the door opened and a gaily-dressed figure, with a turban and bushy whiskers, stepped out.

"Ho! Ho!" said the whiskered chap. "No presents? Why. I have something right in my own book-house."

Sindbad the Sailor went in through his doorway, and came out again, bringing three oranges, that grew so that he had to roll them across the mantel and over its edge into each of the three open stockings. As soon as the oranges had rolled to the toes, Sindbad strode over to a little red book-house on which was marked "Davy and the Goblin."

"Davy! Davy!" called out the sailor "Ask the Butterscotchmen if they won't let us have some candy."

The door of the red-house opened at once, and two figures appeared, a laughing boy and a quaint, little, red goblin. Behind these two came the candy-men, bringing with them all sorts of sweets which they poured over into the hanging stockings. By this time there was quite a lot of noise, with so much talking in front of the row of book-houses, and

There were cookies from Little Red Riding Hood, and although Simple Simon had no penny, the Pie-man let him have three pies for the three stockings.

Some of the people who lived in the book-houses brought toys, some clothes, and some brought printed and pictured stories about themselves that were different from those the children had found in the book-houses.

It was a small space there on the mantel-

Sindbad the Sailor.....had to roll them across the mantel door after door opened, and heads poked out to see what was going on.

When Little Bo-Peep's door opened, all her white, woolly sheep rushed out and scampered here and there. She soon found all but three, around the houses, and did not seem to mind a bit when she discovered the missing woolly lambs had tumbled, one into each stocking.

"Nothing like this ever happened on my island," said Robinson Crusoe, when he saw and heard what was going on. He soon found presents in his big book-storehouse, and his man Friday brought bow-and-arrows for Bob's stocking.

The King of Hearts left off counting his money, and came to his door. Within, you might have seen the Queen of Hearts baking her famous tarts, and you might have seen the sly Knave of Hearts snatch three of the dainties, and dodge through the doorway when the King was looking the other way. But this time, the Knave of Hearts did not get into trouble, for the three tarts that he had taken from the Queen's kitchen were for Bob, and Beth, and the Baby.

piece for so many of the book-people, although they made themselves very small, and as they were so small, the work they did took a long time. So it was, that it was past the dawning of Christmas morning before the three stockings were filled. It was done at last; in the windows and the doorways, and all along in front of the book-houses crowded the little people looking at the three bears who were standing at the edge of the mantelpiece.

"One, two, three," squeaked Tiny and the three bears jumped, one into each, stocking, with their fuzzy ears and perky noses showing over the top.

One by one, the windows and doors closed on the book-people, until only Sindbad the Sailor was left standing on the mantelpiece. He looked down at the well-filled stockings, and just before he stepped through his own doorway, he said aloud to himself:

"I'm glad when Santa Claus forgets To show his jolly Christmas face; It means such fun for me—it lets Me have the chance to take his place."

AN INK THINK

A little bit of berry juice
May make enough of ink,
That when a pen you put to use,
To write down what you think.

YOU take the cork out, and so long as the bottle does not upset, you seldom give a thought about what went into the making of the ink that makes your written word plain and lasting.

I do not intend to tell of the processes that go to the making of the inks of the present day, but rather to a few of the sources of materials from which writing-fluid has been or is now obtained.

In earlier days, before gold and steel nibs were used, or even the sharpened goose quill, the brush was the pen of the writer, and the ink of those days ranged from a paint to a dye. Juices of berries or barks, infusions of the wood of certain trees, such as logwood, even the roots of certain wild plants, yielded colors that were used to illuminate the hand-printed pages of those days.

Doubtless, Tyrian purple, that famed dye of the ancients, was used also as ink. This was, we are given to understand, obtained from a shell fish, the common little "Dog Periwinkle."

In more modern days, as strange material as shell fish is sued to produce the most vivid and unfading scarlet—cochineal. This is secured by scalding immense numbers of tiny, green insects found upon certain cacti, and when the scalding has turned them red, like so many little lobsters, pressing and crushing them in bags which are hung up to drain.

You would not forget the product of the indigo plant, which gives us the richest permanent blue.

All we have told about, however, have had to give place to that wonderful mixture, coal-tar. From it we obtain all the hues of the rainbow, the shade and tint of every blossom, the flash of copper, and the glow of gold.

There is ink a-plenty, and, with most of us, the difficulty is to think of the right word to put down in the right place. Isn't it?

RED HEAD! RED HEAD!

MY white-spotted friend, the Hairy Woodpecker, has already lost much of his summer shyness and, has given himself the job of keeping clear of insects the old apple tree that I can see from the kitchen window. The sight of him this morning, the scarlet dot on the top of his head bobbing about, started me running over the birds I knew under a new heading, the Red Heads.

The Hairy Woodpecker, of course, came first, and before I got through with his relatives, I found that I must include summer as well as winter residents, to make my list in anyway complete.

The king of the Red Heads is, without a doubt, Reddy Tip-Tap, the red-headed woodpecker, who wears a complete red cap and hood, while few of his cousins show more red than a splash, a dot, or a moon-mark of scarlet or cardinal for a red cap. These cousins of Reddy Tip-Tap include the Sapsuckers, and the Flickers, who are so fond of ants for dinner.

The Crossbills, particularly the white-winged ones, carry a rosy feathered head, although, perhaps, they should not be included among the Red Caps, when most of the body feathers are of the same color. But if we left them out we would have to pass by that glorious red-head, the Scarlet Tanager, and that would never do at all.

The solemn-looking, little Oven bird has a true red crown, a bobbin-shaped patch of orange-brown, bordered with black, running backward from the base of the bill over the top of the round head.

A bird even smaller than this one wears a similar head-dress, excepting that between the reddish-orange centre and the black border is a yellow ring. On account of the bird's small size this red top gives the bird a flat-headed appearance, and as the male bird only wears red, the feathered chap looks as if he were wearing a gaudy, little, flat hat.

Another kinglet is even more of a Red Cap than the Golden Crown. This is the Ruby crowned Kinglet, who sports wits about him, and says: "Ladies and Gentlemen, we thank you heartily for your patronage to-night. It has been a great undertaking and many thought that we couldn't make good. It reminds me of the story of the chameleon. You know, a chameleon is a little creature that changes color to suit any background it touches. It used to be the fashion for a young man to give his girl a little chameleon fastened to a chain, that she could pin on her dress, and the little creature would take on the pink, or blue or green tone of the waist, but one young lady put on a plaid dress and the chameleon killed itself trying to make good. Our difficulties were like the plaid waist but we've made good and we haven't killed ourselves." (Applause!)

"Again I am reminded of a chameleon. We've had lots of laughter and a few tears in this programme. We've had humor, heroism and all kinds of emotion and Miss Alexander has been a chameleon taking the color of every mood in turn."

Bravo, Boy! That's better than the adult chairman who says:

"Good wine needs no bush and Miss Alexander needs no introduction, for you all know her, and you know that she's like good wine—she improves with age!"

Toronto has in recent years, spread to so wide an area, that occasionally, I am engaged to appear in a Church whose location is unknown to me. I am directed to "the second block past M. avenue." I reach that point and seeing a lighted church, march in at the basement door. "Are you the speaker of the evening?" the janitor asks politely. "Yes," I reply, doffing wraps, and donning evening slippers. The man stares curiously. "Where are the musicians?" I inquire. "The choir is upstairs, so is the minister. Perhaps I had better tell them you are here." The minister descends, looks at me in a dazed way and inquires: "Are you Miss W., the returned missionary?" "No, I'm Jessie Alexander." Then realizing that "someone had blundered," I ask hastily, "Is this the Methodist Church in which I am to recite?" "No," he answers with evident relief. "It's the Baptist; the Methodists worship half a block further down. We're holding a missionary meeting."

Imagine the effect, if I had stepped out in full regalia and treated the missionary meeting to a humorous selection! But I should have had one appreciative listener, for the janitor murmured as he opened the door for me, "I wish this was the Methodist Church."

At a Caledonian concert on a "Burns' night," exhaustion and an over-heated dressing-room had proved too much for me. A fellow-artist rushed into the wings where a number of Scotia's sons were assembled and said excitedly, "Miss Alexander has fainted! Can some one run for a restorative?" Instantly, every Scotchman's hand shot towards his hip pocket and simultaneously, eleven flasks were proffered. Needless to say, that was before the days of the O.T.A. After the concert, a member of the audience said innocently, "I don't believe you ever recited with more spirit than you did to-night!" "I don't believe I ever did," I murmured between closed lips, hoping that the source of the "spirit" was not too apparent.

I had no curiosity regarding the spirit photographs recently exhibited by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle, having encountered the phenomenon of ghost pictures fully twenty-five years ago.

I was filling some American engagements with Mrs. Emma Beebe Caldwell, coloratura soprano, and in the State of Pennsylvania, which proudly claimed her as a native daughter, we were frequently entertained by friends of her girlhood. Nearing the town of T.—she explained that our prospective hostess, whom she had not seen for years, had become, in the interval, an ardent spiritualist and had made frequent visits to Lilydale, a camp where spooks were wont to congregate.

However, we saw nothing uncanny about our genial hostess or her surroundings, until, after the concert, we repaired for refreshments to an up-stair sitting-room. Then, suddenly, we became conscious of an eerie atmosphere. The walls were hung with ghostly photographs of departed friends—the vague, shadowy forms recalling to my mind Sir Frederick Leighton's painting, "When the Sea Gives Up its Dead."

Mrs. C., impressionable, imaginative,

The Unexpected

with the sensitiveness of the true artist, plainly showed her uneasiness and tried vainly to escape the lure of the weird pictures.

As for me, less than an hour before, I had been reciting the lines of Juliet's Potion Scene—visualizing the vault—

"That ancient receptacle,
Where for these many hundred years, the bones

Of my buried ancestors are packed,
Where bloody Tybalt, yet but green in earth,

Lies festering in his shroud, etc."

And the phantom pictures seemed to be but a hair-raising continuation of that scene.

Left alone for a few moments, we shivered in unison, and my friend said firmly, "We shall sleep in the same room to-night," then whispered, "What are the messages written on the slates?" I tip-toed across the room, to read such subtle injunctions as, "Don't worry, I'm happy!"

In the middle of the night, I awoke with a start, to feel a hand clutching my shoulder and to hear a terrified whisper: "What's that?" "Tap-tap-tap, tap-tap," came a mysterious sound from the sitting-room.

"Oh, I know there's something wrong at home," wailed the soprano. "Won't you please get up and light the gas?"

The chandelier hung high in the centre of the ceiling, and as I moved a chair towards it, I stumbled, and down fell the chair with a crash! A smothered shriek issued from the bed. Then we heard footsteps and the substantial voice of our hostess asked, "Is anything wrong?" "M-M-Mrs. Caldwell isn't well. She has taken a chill," I replied—not untruthfully. "Why, she's chattering," said the lady sympathetically. "Shall I get you some spirits?" "What's that sound across the hall?" I asked hastily. "Oh, that's the sitting-room radiator, I hope it hasn't disturbed you."

Her exit was the signal for a burst of hysterical giggles.

For many years after, any foolish fears expressed by either of us were promptly dispelled, by the utterance of the reminiscent word, "Radiator!"

I had always aimed at spontaneity of expression, and had rather prided myself on the absence of any perfunctory or mechanical effect in my reading, but, alas! pride goeth before a fall.

Going from room to room to recite to the bed patients of a Military Hospital, I was followed by a convalescent, who was able to get about on crutches. "You mustn't keep on following me," I said, "I'm repeating myself like a phonograph." "Well," was the well-meaning retort, "You're a darned good phonograph, and I like to see you putting on the records."

On board a train, the morning after a recital, a woman crossed the aisle and sitting down beside me expressed her appreciation of the programme. "Do you ever have any trouble with your voice?" she asked. "Sometimes, when I have a cold," I admitted. "Well, my husband is in the same line of business as yourself, and he has a gargle that clears up hoarseness like a charm. I'll give you the prescription." "What is your husband's profession?" I asked. "He's an auctioneer," she said proudly.

At a Scotch concert in the Royal City, the footlights were blazing a hundred strong. "You look ghastly in that light," criticized the contralto, "do let me apply the blush-brush." When I emerged from the dressing room, an old Scotch committeeman whom I had met annually, innocently exclaimed, "Eh, but ye're lookin' bonnie, the nicht—fresh as paint."

"Trying it on the dog" is a phrase which I have discovered may be taken literally. In the summer of 1900, I was rehearsing for a programme for The Institute of Arts and Letters, Brooklyn, New York., Tennyson's poem, Enoch Arden, with descriptive music by Richard Strauss, played by that wizard of the keys, Mrs. H. M. Blight.

When I reached the most poignant phrase in the poem, "Not to tell her, never to let her know," the accompaniment was so affecting, that my voice broke and tears flowed. Our Irish setter "Brian Boru" who ordinarily did not object to music, had been growing restive, as the feeling of the poem increased, and when we reached the climax, he rose on his hind legs and uttering dismal howls, put his paws on my shoulders and licked my tears.

At the next rehearsal, the same performance took place at the very same phrase, then Brian bared his teeth and growled threateningly at the accompanist. From that day, Mrs. B. dared not approach the house until my emotional Irish protector had been securely chained.

Evidently, in his doggy mind, she had been associated with, and was therefore responsible for my distress. It would be interesting to know the point where animal intelligence ends, and human reason begins.

At a church concert towards the end of an exhausting programme, Mrs. Blight played an organ solo and was enthusiastically encored. After bowing repeatedly in response to the recalls, she sat down to play the accompaniment of the next number, which happened to be a selection from "Elijah"—"It is enough, O Lord, now let me die"—a fitting expression of her own feelings!

For a programme at the Central Prison, I had chosen my numbers and possible encores with great care but when an "extra" was requested, I selected off-hand, Samuel Lover's story of the Irish emigrant — "Jimmy Hoy," who, getting on board the wrong ship was obliged to work his passage. Jimmy's many mistakes supply the humor of the story. Cutting a swath of canvas from a sail, he proceeded to make a hammock to sleep in. When the Captain discovered the damaged sail he shouted, "Who cut that sail?" "Oi did, sorr," said Jimmy, "Oi did! But Oi only tuk two yarnds of it." "Give him a dozen," roared the Captain. (Then the whole male audience roared for several seconds). I was so covered with confusion, over the unintentional breach of taste amid those surroundings, that I could scarcely continue the story—"Oh, thank ye, sorr, but two yarnds is quite enough. An' what d'ye think he mint by the dozen?" "It was the lashes he mint." (More roars from the men and deeper embarrassment for me).

My friend, Mrs. R. J. Dilworth, soprano, suffered a similar experience at the Prison. Choosing some of her brightest songs, she began with "May Morning," not realizing the absurdity of its sentiment within those walls, till she carolled the opening lines:

"Come out, come out, my dearest dear,
"Come out and greet the morn."

and finished each verse with the three-fold entreaty, "Come out, come out, come out!" The Warden, a wise man who gave humor its natural place where it was so much needed, commented: "Though we're not in a position at present, to accept the invitation to 'Come out,' we're delighted to have the singer come in and invite us so charmingly." (Appreciative laughter!)

That it is risky to telephone one's programme numbers to committee or printer, has been amply demonstrated. "Coaching in Scotland" appeared "Poaching in Scotland" and I was obliged to inform the audience that I was not guilty of the offense of poaching. "Ginevra" degenerated on her proof sheet to "Gin Ever." Handel's "Sound an Alarm" read "Found and Alarmed." A selection from the "Stabat Mater" was disguised as "The Starboard Martyr" and a humorous journal remarked that the "Stabat Mater" had evidently become eyes upon the black shadows gathering in the corners of the big room.

"I think we'd better have the lamps now."

"Yes, I'll get them."

At that instant, a knock, loud, imperative, sounded directly under their feet. So sharp and ominous a knock that both women jumped and shrieked.

"O, O, Agnes, you heard that too?" moaned Mrs. Villier.

"Glory hallelujah, yes," ejaculated Mrs. McGee, drawing her feet up under her for safety. "My soul, yes, it was loud enough to wake the dead! What was it?"

"I, I, don't know," faltered her hostess. "It was on the floor right under our feet. It must have come from the cellar."

"We're not going down there to find out," hastily put in Mrs. McGee. "Whatever it was that knocked, it is something we'll not want to see. That was a warning, Hannah, a solemn warning for one of us. I wish to mercy, I hadn't been telling those old ghost stories. My husband says no good ever comes of it, and I believe him now," sniffled Mrs. McGee.

"Come into the kitchen with me," begged Mrs. Villier, "while I get the lamps."

Keeping within touch the two made their fearsome way into the dark room.

"My, but it's good to see that light," breathed Mrs. McGee. "Light every one of those lamps, Hannah, and the big chandelier too. I'm going to get my wraps on all ready to start home as soon as Wong gets back. He'll have to come down to the motor bus with me, I don't dare go through that strip of cedar woods alone."

"Here's Wong now, and I'll go with you."

Wong, wondering at the vagaries of white ladies, the bossy-lady in particular, trailed away in the wake of two, and back in the wake of one.

A FROST, unusually hard for the mild climate, had set in, and Mrs. Villier came down next morning chilly in body and depressed in spirit.

It was the morning before Christmas and a business matter in the village demanded her attention. She donned her new seal-skin coat and got out a muff, but so low were her spirits that she failed to look into the glass to register her satisfaction, or remark, "It's a far finer coat than Ethel Maud's ever was, even in its palmiest days."

"Heap plentee cold day," remarked Wong, "make heem ice, faller, quick! You faller, eh?"

She went slowly down the walk, and into the highway, forerunner thoughts pressing heavily upon her. A thicket of cedar lay on either side of the road intermixed with holly bushes, as she passed the wall separating her property from that of her brother-in-law, she stopped in deadly fear. A voice, that seemed Thomas's very own was calling her name:—"Hannah! Hannah!"

She gazed up and down the empty, quiet road, not a soul in sight and no other sound broke the frosty stillness.

"That's the third and last warning," moaned Mrs. Villier, "I'm done for now."

Fear dazed, she did not heed where she was stepping, and a patch of glib ice lay directly under foot. There was a sudden swift slide, a wild clutching of air, and Mrs. Villier came heavily to the ground, doubling her right ankle under her. One shrill cry of anguish, an interlude of sickening faintness, and then her fortitude got busy. She gathered up the loose ends of returning consciousness and opened her eyes.

There bending pitifully over her was the girl of the miniature.

This time Mrs. Villier fainted in good earnest.

"She's hurt and terribly frightened, poor thing," thought young Mrs. Tom Villier, who had caught that cry of distress, and had hurried up from the copse where she and Tom had been cutting Christmas holly.

He was some distance farther down the slope, but in a minute her loud coo-ees brought him tumbling over the wall in frantic haste.

"Oh, there you are, dear! You're not hurt are you? What's happened? Why it's Miss McKellar, I, I, mean Mrs. Villier!"

"Your Aunt Hannah," amended his wife, "she's had a very bad fall and is still unconscious."

"Now isn't that too bad," cried Tom, "I'll bring up the car right away, and we'll take her home."

"Bossy-lady all light soon," commented Wong as he assisted in carrying her upstairs. The noonday chime of the old clock penetrated her drowsy senses, with the assurance that she was still of this world. Someone was deftly removing her wraps, but the dread of that face, she had seen bending so near her own, was stronger than her curiosity and she resolutely kept her eyes closed.

Presently the door was cautiously opened, and an unmistakable Villier's voice announced:—"The Doctor will be here right away. He's bringing a nurse with him. I think she is looking a bit better, Anna!"

"Yes, she is," agreed his wife, "it is fortunate that we happened to be right on the spot."

"Everything in this house is just as it used to be years ago when I was running in and out every day," murmured Tom. "I always had good times here. By the way, you'll have a chance to examine the old clock, without having Betty Innes to lead you into mischief," he finished with a chuckle.

"O, Tom, don't," begged his wife, "it was an awfully mean thing to go peeking in at—"

"Was that you? Was it? Was it?" came a shrill, interrupting cry from the bed.

Mrs. Villier was sitting bolt upright in trembling eagerness, gazing at the young people, the hope of a great relief lighting her face.

"Was it you," she reiterated, "really you, not, not, that other one?"

"Yes, it was I, and I beg—" but Anna got no further.

"Yes, it was you," cried Mrs. Villier joyfully, "and I'm more thankful than words can tell that it wasn't any forerunner for me. As for that knock we heard, it was Agnes who was telling ghost stories, and the knock was just as likely to be a warning for her as for me, don't you think so?"

"Yes, of course," they agreed, both deciding that Aunt Hannah was a bit light headed from the fall.

"Anna sounds just like Hannah when it is called," continued Mrs. Villier, "and Tom was calling you, that is what I heard. HER name was Caroline. Tom, you go down to the parlor and bring up that little picture in the gold frame. You'll find it in the same place, just where your Uncle could see it from his sofa."

Tom made a swift trip, pausing in the hall to tap his forehead furtively when within reach of his wife's eyes, and out of the range of Aunt Hannah's.

"Hold it up where Anna can see it," commanded Mrs. Villier.

"My word, Anna," gasped Tom, "it might have been painted for you."

"I'm a very far away relative," observed Anna, "Grandmother had a miniature very like this of Caroline Oswald, her cousin, but I did not know that she was

Why Women Smile

As they never did before

Teeth are prettier today--Millions combat film

Most pictures are now taken with a smile, showing pretty teeth.

Look about you. Note how many smiles now show glistening teeth. That was not always so.

Millions of people are now using a new teeth-cleaning method. Every day they are combating the dingy film on teeth. You will also do so when you make this test and see the quick results.

Film is unsightly

It is film that makes teeth dingy—that viscous film you feel. It clings to teeth, gets between the teeth and stays. If not frequently removed, it may form cloudy coats. It is also the basis of tartar.

That film absorbs stains, so the teeth look discolored. It holds food substance which ferments and forms acid. It holds the acid in contact with the teeth to cause decay.

Millions of germs breed in it. They, with tartar, are the chief cause of pyorrhea. Thus most tooth troubles are now traced to film.

Very few escape

Despite the tooth brush, all these troubles have been constantly increasing. Very few people escaped. The ordinary tooth paste does not effectively combat film, so brushing left much of it intact.

Dental science has long been seeking ways to fight that film. Two ways have now been found. Together they act to curdle the film and then remove it.

Able authorities have proved their efficiency. Now leading dentists the world over are advising their daily use.

A new-type paste

A new-type tooth paste has been created, to comply with all modern requirements. The name is Pepsodent.

These two film combatants are embodied in it. Millions of people have adopted it, largely by dental advice. To the homes of fifty nations it is bringing a new dental era.

Pepsodent brings two other very important effects. It multiplies the starch digestant in the saliva. That is there to digest starch deposits which may otherwise cling and form acids. It multiplies the alkalinity of the saliva. That is there to neutralize mouth acids, the cause of tooth decay.

Thus every use of Pepsodent gives manifold power to Nature's great tooth-protecting forces in the mouth.

Results are quick

Results are quick and convincing. You can see and feel them.

Send the coupon for a 10-Day Tube. Note how clean the teeth feel after using. Mark the absence of the viscous film. See how teeth whiten as the film-coats disappear.

In a week you will realize that you and yours should use this new-day method. And you always will. Cut out the coupon now.

To prevent chapping—one kind of cream

It protects your skin against wind and cold

Protect your skin against wind and cold by applying the right cream before you go out

THE cold winds of winter cannot harm your skin if you give it the proper protection. But they whip the moisture out of an unprotected skin and leave it rough and dry. A chapped skin is the painful and distressing result.

To guard against chapping you need a cream that keeps your skin soft and holds the natural moisture in.

A protective cream for daytime use must be one that your skin will absorb instantly—Pond's Vanishing Cream. Based on an ingredient famous for its soothing effect, this fragrant cream is absorbed the moment you smooth it on your face. It acts as an invisible shield against wind and cold and holds the natural moisture in the skin.

In countries and states that have severely cold climates and long winters—where women simply must protect their skin before venturing out into the cold and wind, they rely on Pond's Vanishing Cream to keep their skin from becoming rough and red and coarse. The enormous use of this cream in cold climates proves how effective it is as protection against wind and cold. No matter where you live, do not go out in winter until you have protected your skin with this cream.

The glare of the sun on the snow also hurts your skin

In winter as well as in summer you must protect your skin against sunburn. It is strong light that really burns the skin; and the glare of the sun on the snow is as great a danger as any summer sun. By using Pond's Vanishing Cream for this protection you are at the same time giving your skin a smooth velvety surface that makes it look its best, and also holds the powder.

However, no one cream can contain all the properties necessary to care for your skin. For cleansing your skin thoroughly, you need a cream with just the right amount of oil—Pond's Cold Cream. The column at the right tells how it completes the care of your skin.

Start using these two creams today. They are sold in tubes and jars of convenient sizes at all drug stores and toilet goods counters at 50 cents each. Each is too delicate in texture to clog the pores. Neither contains anything that can promote the growth of hair. The Pond's Extract Co., Toronto, Can.

To cleanse your skin thoroughly—a very different cream

IF you wish your skin to keep its youthful freshness you must give it a thorough cleansing every night. For this you need a cream with an oil base. Fine particles of dirt bore deep into your pores and ordinary washing cannot remove them. Pond's Cold Cream is a perfect cleansing cream because it contains just enough oil to penetrate the pores and work right out again, bringing all the dirt with it.

Never use a cream with too much oil, because such a cream will overload your pores. Nor one that is too stiff because it has a tendency to remain in the pores and stretch them instead of working out easily.

Just take a little Pond's Cold Cream on your finger tips. It is not greasy, but has just the amount of oil you feel your skin will welcome. Every night before retiring smooth this soft oil cream on your face and neck. See how lightly it works in.

Then wipe it off gently, being careful to use a soft cloth. You will be astonished at the grime on the cloth. This thorough cleansing actually restores freshness and life to a fatigued and dull skin.

When the first fine lines appear you must be most careful to smooth them out with this cream before they have a chance to grow deeper. The oil in the cream lubricates the skin and the little lines will not take hold. Pond's Cold Cream keeps the skin supple, young and smooth.

Many men came and went in her life

SHE fascinated each one only for a little while. Nothing ever came of it.

Yet she was attractive—unusually so. She had beguiling ways. Beautiful hair, radiant skin, exquisite teeth and an intriguing smile. Still there was something about her that made men show only a transient interest.

She was often a bridesmaid but never a bride.

And the pathetic tragedy of it all was that she herself was utterly ignorant as to why. Those of her friends who did know the reason didn't have the heart to tell her.

That's the insidious thing about halitosis (the medical term for unpleasant breath). You, yourself, rarely know when you have it. And even your closest friends won't tell you.

Sometimes, of course, halitosis comes from some deep-seated organic disorder that requires professional advice. But usually—and fortunately—halitosis is only a local condition that yields to the regular use of Listerine as a mouth-wash and gargle.

This halts food fermentation in the mouth and leaves the breath sweet, fresh and clean. So the systematic use of Listerine this way puts you on the safe and polite side. You know your breath is right. Fastidious people everywhere are making it a regular part of their daily toilet routine.

Your druggist will supply you with Listerine. He sells lots of it. It has dozens of different uses as a safe antiseptic and has been trusted as such for half a century. Read the interesting booklet that comes with every bottle.—Lambert Pharmacal Company, Toronto, Canada.

Home-made Candies for the Holidays

BY FRANCIS M. McNALLY

CANDY making is a difficult branch of cookery and often brings disappointments and discouragements. If the beginner will follow a few simple rules the measure of success that greets her efforts will be largely increased. First of all be accurate. This is important in every branch of cookery but is especially necessary in candy making, for the processes are delicate and imperfections of flavour and texture are more noticeable than in more substantial food. Second do not try to make candy on a muggy day; for the weather influences your product and results will probably be unsatisfactory. Third use a thermometer. It is much the simplest and most accurate method for testing candy and the only way to obtain exact temperatures. In making candy in the home we aim to keep it from crystallizing or graining as we more often call it, or else we aim to obtain crystals too small to be separately felt. During the boiling, the sugar which we use is inverted that is it is changed to a simpler sugar which crystallizes with great difficulty and if at all in very small crystals. Experiments have proved that if acid is added to the boiling sugar solution it hastens this change. We make use of this principle in making fondant and other cream candies, with very small imperceptible crystals and also in making taffy and caramels with no crystals at all. The acids most commonly used are vinegar and cream of tartar. Vinegar is used for taffy because we like the flavour and there is not much danger of getting too much acid with this class of candy. In all cream candies where a definite amount of acid is important, cream of tartar should be used. As the whole point in adding acid is to obtain a certain proportion of invert sugar in your solution, it is possible to omit the vinegar or cream of tartar and substitute the required amount of corn syrup, molasses or honey all of which are forms of invert sugar. Do not, under any circumstances use both corn syrup and cream of tartar in your fondant or fudge; the result of such procedure will be a sticky unmanageable mass.

Practically all of the cooked candies fall into the following groups, cream candies, including fondants and fudges; caramels; taffies, and candies with special texture which are generally cream candies added to egg-white or gelatine. For each group the general directions are the same. In making cream candies we aim for two things first to obtain just the right proportions of cane and invert sugar and second to have the cane sugar that is left form crystals so small that they are imperceptible. The amount of invert sugar obtained depends on two things: the amount of acid added and the length of time and the rapidity of cooking. So, to obtain the first aim, one must be accurate, that is, use the exact amount of acid or invert sugar given and cook slowly or rapidly as the recipe states. We know that when sugar solutions are stirred while hot, the crystals tend to become larger; also that when crystals fall into a concentrated sugar solution larger crystals tend to gather round them. Therefore to obtain our second aim we keep all the crystals off the sides of the pan in which the candy is cooked by washing down the sides with a damp cloth wrapped on a fork and avoid stirring the mixture while hot or cooling.

Fudge is one of the easiest home-made candies to make. One of the most important points in making a good fudge is the temperature to which it is cooled before beating. The common custom of beating the fudge the minute it comes from the stove is a mistake. If it is allowed to cool before beating, much finer crystals are formed and smoothness depends on fine crystals. The addition of a little corn syrup also adds to the smoothness but more beating is required. The quality of the finished product, however, repays one for the extra time and effort spent.

A Good Fudge Recipe:—Two cups sugar, two-thirds cup milk, two tablespoons corn syrup, two squares chocolate, two tablespoons butter, one teaspoon vanilla. Melt the chocolate, add the sugar, milk, and corn syrup. Stir until sugar is dissolved, then boil without stirring until a temperature of 236 degrees Fahrenheit is reached. Remove from stove and add the butter without stirring. Allow it to cool until luke warm, then add the vanilla and beat until a small amount dropped from a spoon will hold its shape. Chopped nuts, raisins or dates may be added if desired.

With attention to accuracy of proportions and a good thermometer it is as easy to make good fondant as good fudge. It is wise for the beginner, though, to work with small quantities, two cups of sugar is a satisfactory amount to work with.

Recipe for Fondant:—Two cups sugar, two-thirds cup water, one-eighth teaspoon cream of tartar. Combine the ingredients and stir until the sugar is dissolved. Boil, slowly, without stirring until a temperature of 236° Fahrenheit is reached, keeping all crystals removed from the sides of the pan. Pour out on a platter. When cool enough to let finger be held in the mixture, beat until white and opaque, then knead until smooth and velvety. For maple fondant use one and one-third cups of brown sugar and two-thirds cups maple syrup instead of two cups granulated sugar, and for coffee fondant substitute strong coffee (strained) for water. In both cases follow the same method as in white fondant. The maple will require longer beating. Always allow fondant to ripen before using it to make candies, keep it in airtight jars. The top of the jar should be covered with waxed paper, a clean cloth and a plate.

To Make Fruit Fondant:—Knead into unflavoured fondant stoned raisins, chopped dates, chopped figs, candied cherries, chopped citron and preserved ginger. Use as much as the fondant will take, still admit of being moulded. Press into a flat cake about an inch thick, cut into bars and place on oiled paper to dry for several hours.

Cocoanut Balls:—Flavor plain fondant with vanilla then work into it as much chopped or shredded cocoanut as it will take. Roll in balls and place on oiled paper to dry. Dip in melted fondant, delicately colored and roll in chopped or shredded cocoanut.

Ribbon Creams:—Divide fondant into four pieces of about equal size. Leave one part white and flavour with almond extract, to another add pistachio extract, a little green vegetable coloring and chopped nuts; to the third rose extract and red vegetable coloring and to the fourth a tablespoon of melted chocolate and vanilla extract. Roll each part into a square cake about one-half inch thick and place them on top of each other in the following order, chocolate, almond, pistachio, rose. Press together gently with a rolling pin. Trim the edges and set in a cool place for one hour. Cut into squares and lay on waxed paper for three hours.

Striped Fudge Balls:—Shape fudge into a rectangle and place on top a layer of fondant the same size and shape. Roll as you would a jelly roll, then with both hands continue rolling until the roll is double its first length and cut in slices.

Fudge Sandwich:—Put a layer of fudge three quarters inch thick into a greased pan. On this place a layer of fondant the same thickness. Trim out of pan, cover the fondant with melted dipping chocolate, sprinkle with nuts before the chocolate hardens and cut into squares.

-- to an Appreciative Husband

Sometimes, especially in such a kindly season as Christmas always is, you probably reflect in mingled wonder and gratefulness upon the girl who cast her lot with yours.

Even as you read this page she is perhaps moving about the familiar rooms, carrying on the work that to her is not work because it is inspired by love.

If you are fair, you have a sense of the great treasure that is yours in her day-long and life-long service, in the offering laid so generously upon the shrine of her affection—her home.

Wouldn't you like, this Christmas, to give her something that should speak your thought of her, and that at the same time could lighten the endless round of daily labor she so willingly performs?

Almost any woman will tell you The Hoover is such a gift.

For The Hoover is more than a means to an ever-clean home; it is a way to ease, and leisure, and enjoyment, for the woman in that home.

It is a helper that electrically beats out from rug depths all nap-wearing, disease-laden grit, that sweeps up all surface litter, erects crushed nap, freshens colors, and cleans by air.

It does all these things in one easy, rapid, dustless operation, saving not only labor, but the rugs as well.

Give the woman who is your wife, or your mother, a Hoover this Christmas, and you give her one of the finest gifts a thoughtful man can choose.

sea-sick in crossing the Atlantic. It was but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous when "The Funeral March by Chopin" (the composer's name spelled to make it clear) descended to "A Few Remarks on Shoppin'" and "The Marseillaise" became frivolous as "The Marcel Wave."

"East is East and West is West And never the twain shall meet," says Kipling, but at least there are occasional incidents that seem to bring the Old World very near the New. Strolling about Stratford-on-Avon one day, my funny-bone was suddenly tickled by a sign, "Bacon's Restaurant." "Think of a Bacon conducting a restaurant in Shakespeare's town!" I said to my brother and the whim seized us to have afternoon tea at Mr. Bacon's. "There's a nice little private room upstairs," said a polite attendant. And there was—a room with mullioned windows and roses in bowls and a sweet little waitress looking like an English rose in bloom.

"Is the Mr. Bacon who owns this place the Bacon who wrote Shakespeare's plays?" asked my facetious brother. "Oh, no sir," said the puzzled waitress, "it was Shakespeare who wrote the plays. You can see the desk at the Grammar School where he wrote 'em.' I am always rather ashamed when anyone tries 'joshing' a simple soul so I said by way of apology for our ignorance, 'We're from Canada and we are enjoying your English country so much.' Her whole manner changed, the demure face was now alive with eagerness as with clasped hands she exclaimed, 'Oh! from Canada! I have a friend in Canada. I wonder if you might know him. He lives in a shire called Sa-Scratch-e-wan.' I often wonder now if that English rose is blooming in our Western Province.

A few days before I left California for British Columbia, the Canadian colony at San Diego arranged on two days' notice for a recital. There was no time to print programmes. An Ontario lady requested me to give an original travelogue "Coaching in Scotland" and during intermission I managed to recapture the words of the sketch. From the beginning of the monologue I noticed a man with cheek-bones like Scotch hills sitting forward in his chair, and when I reached the speeches of the old portress of Craigmillar Castle, the Scotchman slapped his knee and chuckled with special enjoyment. At the end of the programme he greeted me with "Ye've got Mistress Simpson doon tae the life." Then he told me he had been Head Gardener at Craigmillar Castle for fifteen years and was now superintending Mission Gardens—one of the attractions of San Diego which I had seen in the afternoon. "Ye'll mebbe, come to-morrow mornin' and let me show ye the gardens mase!" "Unfortunately I'm leaving at 8 a.m. for Pasadena." As I was boarding the train I heard a messenger boy paging me loudly, "Miss Jessie Alexander, and he held in his arms a huge box which contained masses of some of the rarest flowers in the gardens, and a message from the Superintendent "In Remembrance of Craigmillar."

In the month of May, a G.T.R. train was moving through the Niagara fruit-belt. My destination was a flag-station. The conductor pulled the rope, the brakeman, carrying my suit-case, jumped into the ditch, caught me in his arms, deposited me safely and hopped on the moving train. I viewed the landscape o'er and caught my breath at the pink and white beauty of that world of bloom. In the distance, I saw a man approaching. He led me to a cottage framed with lilacs. At the door, stood a smiling woman holding in her arms, an apple-blossom of a baby.

"I believe I've strayed into the Garden of Eden," I remarked after first greetings. "Tell her!" said the woman, mysteriously, to her husband.

"No! You tell her," urged the man.

Wicker furniture for the sun-room or porch is always an acceptable Christmas gift. That depicted above is of unusual charm, for it is finished in a "shadow effect" in two tones of ivory. Plain orange-colored cushions are provided for two of the chairs. The divan and the third chair are, however, cushioned in a decorative chintz that carries a large creamy-white pattern on its orange ground.

Furniture For Christmas Giving

BY COLLIER STEVENSON

TWINKLING electrics, fragrant balsam, crimson-berried holly and waxen-budded mistletoe impart a festal air to all the busy marts of Christmas commerce. They gladden the eye wearied by the quest for gifts; they marvellously mitigate the bustle and congestion that are so inevitably incidental to shopping as the holiday season approaches. Wares of infinite variety are outspread on every hand to intrigue the heart and purse: lustrous china, sparkling silver, scintillating jewel, fabrics of wonderful weave and color, books, flowers, furniture—seemingly anything and everything that either donor or recipient could possibly crave but await discerning selection.

A wonderful change has occurred within recent years in our attitude towards Christmas gifts and giving. Instead of buying haphazardly—as it must be admitted most people once did!—a host of more or less useless articles to be bestowed indiscriminately upon unprotected friends and acquaintances, we now try to consider very carefully the individual tastes of those to whom our gifts are going. Thus, to the friend whose quiet gray, rose and blue living room we have enjoyed, we are scarcely likely to send an orange-shaded lamp. It is far more probable that our gift, if intended for use in that living room, will be a small wall-mirror, with a quaint frame of Heppelwhite influence, painted in dull blue and lightly touched with antique gilt. That would be a choice both appropriate and distinctive.

The "useful gift" has, indeed, come into its own of late: and that no doubt accounts for the present popularity of furniture for Christmas giving. Certainly, nothing could be more useful than furniture; that is, if in design and material alike it be acceptable to the recipient. Difficult as it is to select gifts of a purely accessory nature, it is far more problematical to choose furniture that will fit perfectly into the homes of our friends. As a matter of fact, furniture should never be given unless the donor is sure that it will be more welcome than any other type of present: and, under no circumstances, should furniture of an extreme character be chosen.

The real keynote to success in furniture giving is, then, twofold—first, a thorough knowledge of the surroundings in which the furniture is to be permanently placed: and, secondly, an insight into the requirements of those surroundings. The last is, of course, the more important: and, incidentally, the more likely to present pitfalls to the unwary. Nevertheless, by the proper foresight, these pitfalls may quite easily be avoided.

Proper foresight simply implies that, before choosing a gift of furniture, the prospective donor will study carefully the present furnishings and the architectural character of the room for which the gift is intended. If the woodwork of the room, for instance, be finished in ivory enamel and the doors in mahogany, furniture of oak could not be chosen with propriety. A gift of brightly-painted and flower-bedecked furniture, however alluring it might be while on display, would be altogether inappropriate as a gift for a room in which the woodwork had a sombre, dark oak finish. Nor would a great, comfort-bringing armchair upholstered in flowered tapestry be suitable for a room boasting curtains and other accessories of floral-patterned chintz. It is apparent, therefore, that the application of proper foresight in choosing gifts of furniture is really tantamount to the exercise of good taste.

Fortunately, "period rooms" nowadays belong chiefly to the homes of the very rich or of the very newly rich. As a consequence, suites of furniture, except for dining rooms and bedrooms; and not always even there! are no longer deemed essential. Indeed, instead of rigidly adhering to any one period or to the use of suites of furniture, most modern householders now make a laudable effort to select furniture which is comfortable as well as beautiful: and, in so doing, they are inclined to look for color and material harmony in preference to stylistic formality.

This new order of things is, naturally, of particular advantage to the prospective donor of furniture in promoting freedom in selection. That freedom was especially to the fore in choosing a gift piece for one living room wherein the principal furniture was of brown mahogany of Colonial design and the woodwork of the white-enamelled finish founded on Colonial precedent. The piano, the gate-leg reading-table, two rush-bottomed chairs and a footstool were all of mahogany. Two other chairs of Windsor design were painted black, varied by narrow lines of gray. And now for the gift piece—'twas a wing chair of wicker, stained silver-gray and cushioned in American Beauty rep! Diversity there, surely: nevertheless that new gray chair proved to be just "the right thing in the right place;" for the room into which it fitted boasted of plain gray rugs, a wall-covering of silver-gray grasscloth and hangings of pink-flowered black cretonne. Even the lighting fixtures responded to the gray note of the chair; for they were of silver, shaded in silver gauze over pale rose silk.

Genuine antique furniture is, of course, almost generally acceptable: and that is true of the very creditable replicas that are now obtainable for a comparatively moderate outlay. Mahogany and the equally popular native walnut fashion many of these reproductions. The rush-bottomed, ladder-backed chairs are especially pleasing in mahogany. Mahogany, too, is often used for pie-crust, tilt-top tables, for tea-wagons, muffin-stands and quaint footstools. The old "nests" of tables—really a number of small tables that fit one under the other for convenience in placing against the wall—come not only in mahogany and walnut, but in painted and laquered finishes that are refreshingly novel. Tables of this sort are an ideal gift for any home in which considerable entertaining is done; for assembled, they occupy but little space, although they provide much room for games or refreshments when scattered.

Furniture for Christmas Giving

The popularity of painted furniture evidently knows no dimming. For bedrooms, breakfast-rooms, kitchens, sun-porches and informal dining rooms, painted furniture is always a logical choice. Nevertheless, for gift purposes it should never be selected unless the correct setting has been or will be provided. Think of a graceful, little breakfast-room suite of apple-green against walls of light blue and woodwork of hideous dark brown "graining!" The whole effect would be intolerable; yet that same suite would be delightful with a background of creamy walls and old ivory woodwork. Be certain, then, of the right background before choosing anything in the way of painted furniture.

Although the average housewife needs must spend many long hours in the room, the kitchen is, perhaps, the last to receive any decorative attention. On that account, a gift of kitchen furniture is usually apt to receive an especially cordial welcome. In this connection, the painted furniture is worthy of note—as it often paves the way to a complete metamorphosis. Once its shabby, time-stained, dark furniture is replaced by something pleasing in design and stimulating in coloring, any kitchen is far on the road towards an entire transformation. Much of the newer kitchen furniture is finished in immaculate white enamel, which is gratifyingly clean in appearance. Gaily-colored pieces are, however, not neglected; bright blues and fairly light greens, perhaps, predominating.

The kitchen cabinet, whether in wood or steel, is one piece of furniture that is likely to appeal to the housewife. Long before its pristine freshness has vanished, the cabinet will have been found a truly worth-while gift. Finishes of both natural effect and white enamel are obtainable; but these sometimes give place to brighter colors to harmonize with the other furniture used in the kitchen.

Even in a very small hall, room can usually be found for one of the quaintly-painted chests of Italian influence portrayed in this illustration. The soft warm green that is the basic hue of this chest is relieved by the application of faded pinks, parchment yellows and reddish browns, that form a pleasant harmony. The antique handles on the one large drawer of the chest are of dull gilt.

PYORRHOCIDE POWDER

keeps the gums healthy

Tender Gums

Made firm and healthy

Pyorrhocide Powder is the one dentifrice that contains the elements which exhaustive clinical research and tests have proved necessary for keeping the gums healthy as well as the teeth white and clean.

It cleans the teeth scientifically by removing the mucoid deposits and daily accretions before they become hard, gum-irritating tartar formations which are the principal cause of pyorrhea.

Pyorrhocide Powder strengthens tender gums; corrects bleeding gums; hardens soft spongy gums.

See your dentist regularly — use Pyorrhocide Powder daily — and you can avoid loss of teeth from Pyorrhea. The economical dollar package contains six months' supply. Sold by all Canadian druggists.

Fabrics for cushions and hangings, if marked by some real distinction, hold many possibilities for Christmas giving. In this instance, the fabric is a heavy linen taffeta; cinnamon-brown as to ground, with a gay little pattern in rose, yellow, blue and green. Could this coloring be other than harmonious in a room wherein the furniture is of brown mahogany, decorated with colorful decalcomanias.

Furniture for Christmas Giving

A folding "ladder-chair" is still another piece of furniture that is useful for the kitchen, as it admirably fulfils both the purposes its name indicates. A high revolving-stool, such as has long been employed in offices, is also in popular demand for kitchen service. One of the smaller furnishings that is frequently entirely overlooked in the kitchen is a roomy wastepaper-basket. This should, preferably, be either of metal or fibre, painted to match the furniture.

Of chairs, there is really a bewildering array for every room in the house, as well as the porch. One of the most adaptable types is the "hour-glass"—a woven grass chair that hails from the Orient. As the name intimates, the design of this chair is based on the ancient hour-glass. It is a remarkably durable, invariably comfortable and always artistic chair that may be safely used out-of-doors or within; for water, instead of shortening its life, prolongs it. So adaptable, indeed, is the hour-glass chair, it seems to quickly fit in with almost any surroundings. Furniture of wicker, willow and reed shares this adaptability. In the natural finish, in stained and in painted effects, it can be related to the needs of almost any type of room. Some of the most attractive effects are in "shadow coloring," secured by successive coats of contrasting color. One beautiful suite of wicker has dull blue as its basic hue, with the "shadow" effect in old gold—a thin coat of old gold paint having been applied over the blue and partially wiped off before dry. Cushions of linen, patterned in wide stripes of old gold, blue and rose, are an harmonious feature of this furniture. Another wicker suite is suggestive of lovely old ivory; for, over its ground-coat of soft yellow, creamy-white paint has been lightly run. For the cushions in this instance, a cream-colored chintz gay with tiny black pots filled with orange bloom and gray-green foliage is used.

Has the mahogany lamp had its day? Other varieties would seem to be supplanting it in popular favor now; both for floor and table use. The tall bridge-lamps, in plain or decorated iron, were the forerunners of the many metal designs on view for this year's giving. Silver and gilt finishes are to be found singly and in combination; and they are interesting when the design of the lamps is not offensively ornate. The Della Robbia finish, with its rich combination of reds, blues and browns, has also invaded the realm of the lamp—and it, too, is satisfying when not overdone. New conceits in shades are not lacking. As a relief from the ubiquitous painted parchment and fringe-edged silk, shades of heavy file lace mounted on silk or gauze are being exploited in some of the ultra-smart shops.

The trend in table-lamps is quite evidently towards the vase of highly glazed pottery in plain colors. These are particularly useful in a decorative sense, as they can be depended upon to give just the requisite accent to a color-scheme. In a room having hangings and cushions of a chintz combining green, mauve, blue and black, for instance, the lamp-vase might be in solid mauve; again, it might be of glazed black, with a shade of mauve lined with rose.

Drapery-fabrics are, of course, scarcely furniture; yet, as "furnishings," they are very closely akin. It is, then, surely not amiss to list them under furniture for Christmas giving. To choose draperies

The Christmas Gift Solution that Makes Gift Selection Easy

NEARLY two thousand years ago, Three Wise Men came out of the East, bringing gifts; Gold, Frankincense and Myrrh.

A custom was established then and ever since it has been the practise to include gifts in an universal recognition of the glorious Christmas Season.

A Gift records your best wishes. You want to "say it" from the head as well as from the heart. Make your gift express your appreciation of the recipient's taste.

YOUR discrimination is reflected, not once, but twelve times during the year, by subscribing to the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL for a friend. This gift will please, because it is helpful and entertaining. Fiction in short stories and serials of the highest type; special departments for home happiness and economic functioning are always included.

WOMEN in every walk of life will be glad to get the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL twelve times a year. It has an appeal that cannot be denied. Avoid the weary days of Xmas shopping in crowded stores,—do away with the bother and trouble of despatching presents by using the coupon at the bottom of this suggestion.

USE this coupon to-day—Immediately on hearing from you we will enter the name of your friend on our mailing list. We will send her an engraved Christmas Card, advising her of your thoughtfulness. She will also receive our special Christmas Number. She will receive both of these on Christmas morning.

NOTHING could be fairer.

NOTHING could be more appropriate.

Cut out this coupon. Fill in Names and addresses of persons to whom you desire us to send a year's subscription. Give your own name and attach a Money Order. Mail this to us and we will see that your present arrives on Xmas morning.

Canadians are accustomed to hear their country described as common place and destitute of romance, in spite of the story of Quebec and the centuries of background of Annapolis Royal. Hence, the Canadian reader is grateful to Katherine Hale (Mrs. J. W. Garvin) for the title "Canadian Cities of Romance," which is inscribed on a highly attractive and picturesque cover. The descriptions of various cities include fourteen of our Canadian communities—from Halifax to Victoria. These articles appeared in the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, from time to time, and many of our readers will welcome their inclusion in a highly attractive volume. Katherine Hale is always a poet, in her attitude towards personages and places, and has given each of these cities an atmosphere and suggestion of its own. The illustrations by Dorothy Stevens are in keeping with the artistic excellence of this literary production. (Published in Toronto, by McClelland and Stewart).

"Little Foxes," by E. A. Henry, D.D., is a series of addresses, far from being the "exhorting" type of article which used to be written for the young person. Dr. Henry has a breezy, stimulating way of talking about the small faults which beset the young person and the most sympathetic way of showing how these may be overcome. The "little foxes which spoil the vines," are among our most subtle foes and any reader may find wise counsel in reading this little book. (Published in Toronto by Thomas Allen. Price, $1.25).

* * *

"Neighbors," a Happy Novel of the North West, by Robert Stead, lives up to its sub-title and is a thoroughly sunshiny affair, which faithfully, if somewhat crudely, presents the life of a youth born in a small town in Ontario, who decides to "go West," and have a home-stead. The hero, Frank Hall, has a sister Marjorie; his friend, John Lane, has a sister, Jean. Mrs. Hall is kind enough to die and Mr. Peter Lane also departs for that land where the inhabitants neither marry nor are given in marriage. After some months, Mr. Hall becomes the second husband of the recently-bereaved Mrs. Lane, and the four young persons pack their trunks and have them checked to Regina. Of course, you know that there are two more weddings and that they are Hall-Lane affairs. There is a half hearted villain, of the name of "Spoof" who complicates matters for a while but who is unable to accomplish much in the way of real mischief. Mr. Stead knows his Ontario and also the West and evidently enjoys writing about happy persons who are enjoying the vagaries of Love's Young Dream. (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, $1.75).

* * *

"The Twenty-First Burr" by Victor Lauriston, is a genuine mystery story, with a pretty but quiet murder in the foreground. Adam Winright has gone out of the world in an unobtrusive fashion, but his daughter, Laura, suspects foul play and the Nurse, Glory Adair, takes up the search for the murderer. You would never suspect a quiet little burr of being stuck up with poison and sending a peaceful citizen out of life; but just read this enthralling tale and you'll find out weird things about burrs. The story is well told and Glory Adair is a super-detective who is wasting her powers on typhoid fever patients. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"Our Prairie Trails," by Frederick Philip Grove, is an interesting volume, containing an account of journeys taken every week-end by a country teacher whose drive covered sixty-eight miles, "coming and going"—and ninety miles in wintry months. Seven of these "drives" are described for us in language that is simple and gracious, with a breath of out-doors freedom about it. If, in the old days, you enjoyed reading "Prue and I," by Curtis, and if you like the essays by David Grayson, I think you will find the "trails" worth taking—especially "Dawn and Diamonds." The illustrations by C. M. Manly, A.R.C.A., are delicate and picturesque bits of art which are in keeping with the spirit of the traveller. (Published in Toronto, by McClelland and Stewart. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"The Dust Flower," by Basil King, is a story written by one of our prominent Canadian novelists. The plot of the tale is one sure to arrest the young person's attention. Barbara Walbrook is highly disgusted with the habits of her fiancé, Rashleigh Allerton, a gentleman given to tarrying at the wine. Barbara breaks off the engagement and Rashleigh rushes off, determined to marry the first woman he meets. He proposes in vain to several strangers and is finally accepted by Letty, a poor little waif who has escaped from a cruel step-father. The marriage is merely one in name and of course Barbara once more returns to interest in her former lover. It is a curious situation, in which the bloom of high culture and the Dust Flower (as Letty is called) are placed in rivalry. The story is one of absorbing human interest, but Rashleigh does not seem to us a young man worthy of devotion—even that of a dust product. There, again, however, the story may be true to the life it depicts. (Published in Toronto, by Hodder and Stoughton. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"When Winter Comes to Main Street," by Grant Overton, is an advertisement which deals with Doran books and authors. There are nine of these writers: McKenna, Maugham, Arnold Bennett, Rebecca West, and others, and their varying characteristics are dealt with in vivacious fashion by one who is evidently enamored of his task. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto).

* * *

"The Timber Pirate," by Charles Christopher Jenkins, is a story of wild adventure in the Laurentians. Acey Smith, the hero, is a man of extraordinary strength and purpose, a being of complex nature, in which Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde are constantly at strife. The story is told with a melodramatic force in the unfolding of Acey Smith's vengeance, and the reader is left to wish that the end of the story were just a little different, for Acey is too interesting to disappear. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

You hear of the 8 hour Day What of the 8 hour Night?

SLEEP is "Nature's sweet restorer." If you don't get enough of the right kind of sleep you can't be mentally alert. Nor can you be at your best, physically.

An eight-hour sleeping night is quite as important as an eight-hour working day. If you don't get your proper sleep, you become irritable; your work becomes a task.

If you are in the habit of drinking tea or coffee, that may be the explanation of your disturbed and restless sleep with consequent nervous irritability. For both tea and coffee contain caffeine—a nerve-irritant.

Why not give yourself the benefit of the doubt? It's so easy to find out for yourself—stop using tea or coffee and drink healthful, fragrant Postum instead.

Postum is a pure and wholesome cereal beverage, absolutely free from caffeine or drugs of any kind. Thousands of people prefer it to any other table beverage, for its rich flavor alone.

Musical Christmas Gifts

Some suggestions which may help to solve the annual Yule-tide quandary

BY HECTOR CHARLESWORTH

I MUST disclaim any qualifications for editing a department on "Hints to Shoppers", which I have no doubt is a very useful institution for countless readers at this time of year. But with the growth of music in the home and the vast increase in the public appetite for music, it seems to me that a new field for selection has been opened up in connection with the annual Christmas gift problem. First of all, though cynics may deride the practice; and persons of "near" propensities may lament it, I hope that the traditional habit of Christmas giving will never die out. Even when wasteful, as in the case of ephemeral and perishable gifts it has its moral uses as an expression of generosity. But the real aim should be to eliminate waste and folly from this happiest of practices; by giving presents that have a value, more or less permanent, and which provide pleasure that is not momentary but continuous. All this sounds rather pedantic and preachy; but my excuse is that it is common sense. I think then that from the standpoint of higher utility, the musical Christmas gift has unimpeachable claims to consideration.

The notable fact about the real Christmas gift is the immense variety of wares that the name embraces; and the extraordinary range of the price-scales. If you are poor, you can give a new record that costs hardly more than an ornate Christmas card; or if you are a millionaire a grand piano the cost of which runs into the thousands. I do not know of any other type of gift that offers such wonderful adaptability to the purse, lean or heavy; and the main point is that whether your gift be cheap or costly, it is almost certain to give pleasure of indefinite duration.

The growing popularity of musical gifts is necessarily bound up with the vast increase in the number of people who are interested in music in both its lighter and serious forms. Modern invention has so multiplied the means whereby music may be produced in the homes of the people that a vast new field for giving has been created of recent years. Moreover, in the mere matter of aesthetic appearances, musical trades have kept pace remarkably well with the movement for home decoration which has exercised so much influence over domestic surroundings within the memory of most of us. Let us consider first the improvements in the outward aspects of the most familiar musical instruments.

Time was when the piano, either square or upright was rather an unsightly object in the average living room, that jarred on the sense of comfort which gives charm to any home however humble. It was ugly and formal looking. There used to be a stock joke of the Josh Billings and Eli Perkins period in American social life, about a lady who was so modest that she insisted on covering up the legs of her piano. Now, there was some reason in this mythical lady's conduct; the same reason that should dictate the concealment of many legs of a less passive character—they were so very ugly, with their heavy curves and lumps supposed to remotely represent fruit and vegetation. But recent years have seen a growth of artistic taste in the designing of pianos, whether grand or upright, until they have become part of the decorative scheme of a well planned room. The unsightly legs of the old-fashioned instrument have given place to underpinnings of graceful and classic design; and there have been all-round aesthetic improvements. The utilization of a great variety of woods in addition to the standardized rosewood and mahogany has been a great step toward decorative harmony; and the hand decorated piano, a thing unheard of thirty years ago, is now familiar to everyone. The increased range of materials has been accompanied in a development of styles in design, so that it is now possible to buy instruments which harmonize with almost any type of furniture.

* * *

MY reason for mentioning these developments is that in most Canadian cities and towns there has been an abnormal amount of home-building during the present year. Countless people have just entered new houses or are about to do so within the next few months, and for the well-to-do, a piano suitable to the new environment would make an ideal Christmas gift to the family.

What has been said of the adaptability of the piano to the decorative scheme of the home is also true of the reproducing instruments. The early types of these machines, though they afforded much interest and pleasure, were unsightly, but every year higher standards of taste and a greater variety of styles has been developed in connection with the outward appearance of the stands in which the epochal invention of a sound-reproducing mechanism is contained; and in the record cabinets which accompany them. Such an instrument is no longer an excrescence in the decorative plan of a living-room but an harmonious piece of furniture. Of course the purely visual side of the reproducing instrument is its smallest claim in connection with its suitability as a gift. The main thing to be considered is the immense and long-enduring pleasure that such a machine, even in its cheaper and less ornamental forms, can give. The numbers of families and private individuals living in a room or two, who own such instruments, is now very large; but yet there must be a good many people who do not possess one. There is probably no gift that could be devised for the average individual in which so much fun and exhilaration are awaiting release.

The higher musical and educational aspects have often been dwelt upon. It is a means whereby men and women of musical taste but without sufficient education to make music of the finer order for themselves, or lacking an income sufficient to permit indulgence in many concerts, can get in touch with the best music as interpreted by the most distinguished artists. As has frequently been said, the reproducing instrument is responsible for an immense extension of musical knowledge and taste. But this is not all. The instrument has its manifold uses as a social factor. It is a great stimulant for that most wholesome of recreations, home dancing. Several years ago I pointed out in the columns of this magazine that the reproducing instrument was helping to solve a problem that has vexed many social students; that of keeping the young people in the home; and providing them with healthy amusement. It is now no longer indispensable for one member of a group of young people to be a pianist, in order to get a dance going. With the aid of either the player-piano or the record machine a merry party can be improvised at fifteen minutes' notice, and in the case of the latter type of instrument the jazz orchestra is ready for the use of dancers, over in the corner.

The present generation of young people is extremely fortunate in this source of relaxation. If there are several in the household, the whole family can have a dance after dinner, even when no friends happen to drop in. Those, who like myself, see a good deal of girls and boys in their teens, know how much this means to

Coralie's Christmas

Coralie's mother was left a widow when she was 29. And Coralie was seven.

Coralie's father had been so busy spending—for his wife and little daughter—that he had not had time to save for them; except to invest in a five thousand dollar insurance policy on his life.

When he died his widow received this splendid amount in a lump sum.

It looked like a lot of money to Coralie's mother!

But when immediate expenses were all paid and her affairs settled, she had hardly half that amount left. She was advised to invest two thousand in something safe—at 7%.

But that would pay her only $140 per year—less than 39 cents a day for the complete support of two persons! It wasn't enough!

However, Coralie's mother was young, bright and fortunate. She got a corner of home for herself and her child, with friends, at twelve dollars a week—and she got back the job she had had before she was married—at $25 per week.

She banked her two thousand dollars for emergencies—for Coralie.

While Coralie had her mother to love and work for her the child was safe!

But Coralie's future haunted the mother—she must provide for that. Resolutely, and with infinite self-denial, she set aside three dollars and a quarter a week. She couldn't make it more.

At the end of a year, she had only saved one hundred and sixty-nine dollars. It would take her almost six years to save another thousand to add to the "emergency" fund—and if anything happened to her in the meantime—she used to wake up in the night and think about it—till the dread of it filled the room like an evil smothering presence.

Then She Found a Friend who showed her how to invest money to provide certain protection for Coralie, or for her own old age.

Coralie's mother—at 31—would have given the whole of her two thousand dollars for this assurance.

Instead, she invested $169.00 in this immediate and future protection, and thereafter this same yearly amount of her savings.

Just at Christmas, six years later, influenza ended her loving labors.

Coralie was thirteen.

The people with whom she lived loved her. But they were not well off. They had children of their own. What could they do for Coralie?

Then the Friend stepped in to fulfil the promise made to Coralie's mother.

The mother had only saved $1,014. But every month till Coralie was eighteen there came a cheque for fifty dollars—ample to provide for her welfare and education—till three thousand dollars had been paid in this way. And to-day (because there was interest on the money all the time) Coralie's Christmas stocking holds a cheque for $3,000, a gift from Coralie's mother, sent through the Friend who so loyally discharged the promised obligation.

That Friend was

"TELL THE CHRISTMAS STORY."

A well-known firm of Camera manufacturers has published an attractive picture under the above title as an advertisement for the Christmas trade in Cameras. The picture represents Christmas afternoon. The grandfather is in the foreground, and extended on his lap sleeps a tired little girl. Round about, on the floor, are toys of all descriptions, dolls, little animals, railway tracks, trumpets and a miscellaneous collection of other things. No wonder the poor tired child took refuge in sleep. At the half-opened door the fond parents peep and whisper—with the camera.

THE REAL CHRISTMAS STORY

This is not the Christmas Story at all. That story belongs to another world.

THE YOUNG PHYSICIAN

"It has got to stop," said a young Family Physician to me last Christmas. He is an able man, careful, well-trained, thorough, conscientious, kind, and has, as he deserves, a large practice. His patients are much attached to him and well they may be. They have few better friends than their Doctor.

"It has got to stop," he said. "It is a very serious matter, the way children get upset at Christmas time now. There is too much excitement, and they get worn out with expectation and fuss and worry long before Christmas comes. Then that upsets their parents, if they are not upset already, and they are all ill and exhausted, completely worn out. Why, some of my families don't get over it until March. There has been a good deal of sickness this winter and Christmas is at the bottom of not a little of it."

There is a truth in what the Doctor says.

YOUR CHRISTMAS IN 1922

It is a good thing that this number of "The CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL" is published on or about December 1st. This issue will reach you just in time to give the Family Physician a chance to try to put a little sense into your head about Christmas before it is too late.

Daddy, I don't mean you. You have your faults, but I heard you say last Christmas "We'll just see if this house will be turned into a Fool's Paradise next Christmas." Do you remember?—Well then, I want you to help me. You know that last year mother and the girls tried to do too much Christmassing and they got too tired. So tired that some of them were cross and nearly ill. Worried they were too. And the little children were really sick. They had eaten more than they could manage and Nature came to the rescue soon after the Christmas dinner, and swept it all away.

THE CHRISTMAS WORRIES

Worry is the foul fiend of the Doctor's life. "I wish I knew what she is worrying about," said a famous Canadian consultant the other day. "If I could find that out we might know how to cure her." Well, my aristocratic consulting brother in the Medical profession, perhaps you are right. Perhaps we could cure her that way. But more often it is not the presence of a special worry, such as a broken heart, a bankrupt husband, or a wayward child. It is rather that the habit of worrying—worrying about something, or nothing, or anything, or everything—has got possession of the mind of the patient. This is a bad mental habit and worry means poor health. What is the real test of age?

THE CONDITION OF THE ARTERIES

If the arterial walls are good muscular structure, resilient and able to contract and relax easily as muscular tissue should, then we are in good condition. But if, in middle life, the arterial walls are stiff and poor and cannot work well, premature age has overtaken us. And what causes this? Mostly worry.

CAUSES OF PREMATURE BREAKDOWN

In decent respectable people, who don't eat too much and don't drink much, and don't have any of these terrible diseases that the Social Hygiene people are trying to prevent (Good success to them!)—Worry and strain are the leading cause of premature age, breakdown, and permanent ill-health.

So we must avoid worry, for ourselves and our families and all that we have any responsibility for, on Christmas Day, and every other day.

THE CHRISTMAS BUDGET

The questions of the Budget for Christmas are sometimes a source of worry and that means fatigue and ill-health. A happy person can do a great deal of work without feeling fatigue, but a worried person is tired before she begins.

So first of all, let us arrange our Christmas Budget. It means extra money for food, and entertainment and that greatest luxury of all, the gifts of the Loving Heart, the heart that remembers the grace of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we, through His poverty, might be rich. That heart is the only kind of heart that can give real gifts at Christmas tide.

So when the December cheque comes to be written, Daddy will put in something for Christmas. As for the big boys and the big girls, who are beginning to earn, and the little boys and the little girls who have ten cents a week—or is it five cents?—for pocket money, they have been saving up for Christmas for quite a while, and they are making their lists and apportioning their money. But the greatest Christmas gifts are not money but the Loving Christmas Heart that enriches life. Don't try to make too many gifts at Christmas.

CHRISTMAS FOOD

Do you want to have indigestion? You don't. Very well, then, you better beware of indigestible things and of over-fatigue and of being "too busy to go out to lunch," and all that sort of thing. Take your regular meals and eat slowly. I mean, go on chewing your food thoroughly and don't swallow it until it has been "The King's Arrow," by H. A. Cody, author of "Glen of the High North" and other tales of remote places, is a picturesque story of a momentous period in the history of Canada. Dane Norwood, called the "King's Arrow," was an ideal messenger through the forests and along the streams in those early Loyalist days. Mr. Cody has gone back to the year 1783, when the United Empire Loyalists landed in New Brunswick and has given us a stirring story with red Indians and a stolen heroine in the foreground. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"The Poisoned Paradise," by Robert W. Service, is a novel by the well-known author of "The Songs of a Sourdough." Mr. Service is anxious to make a name for himself as novelist and in this melodramatic tale of Monte Carlo he certainly manages to hold the reader's interest in the beautiful and persecuted heroine, Margot, and the sturdy young hero, Hugh Kildair. The misfortunes which befall these two young persons are quite overwhelming to all but the stars of the movies; but, of course, they emerge serenely out of them all. As the writer describes the scene, Monte Carlo is more poison than paradise, and one is rather glad to escape from the atmosphere of the Casino. This book is assured of popularity and a place on the screen. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"Pagan Love," by John Murray Gibbon, is a distracting tale of a wonderful personage named Neruda, a Czech of sorts, who takes a fancy to a young Scot, Walter Sterling Oliphant, and helps the latter to emigrate (via Quebec) to New York. Walter's adventures in that city, among socialists, artists and walking delegates, are enough to fill a Sunday supplement. There is a Great Secret in the story which leads to tragedy and leaves the reader hoping that Walter will eventually meet the little Canadian girl, Beatrice Anderson, again. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"The Return of Blue Pete," by Luke Allan, is a story of the far Northwest, where law and order are enforced only by stern methods and where "pals" have a code all their own. The narrative is of the well-known "wild north" order, but the story is not machine made and the reader actually likes Boy Mahon and takes a deep interest in Blue Pete. There is the health of the Northland in the story and most Canadians will ask for the rest of Luke Allan's books, that they may learn more of Blue Pete's doings. (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

* * *

"Solario the Tailor," by William Bowen, is a highly enjoyable collection of tales concerning the magic doubler. If you have read "The Enchanted Forest," you will need no urging to read this account of some of the adventures of the Old Man in the Spangled Coat. The writer is a born teller of fairy tales and we soon find ourselves enamored of Solario the Tailor (who is none other than the Old Man.) while the illustrations by J. Ormsbee are a sheer delight. (Published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto).

Adds Wonderful Charm, Beauty and Expression to Any Face

More than all else, well defined eyebrows and luxuriant lashes create the beauty and expression of your face. The slight darkening, the accentuation of line and shadow, is the secret. Instantly and unfailingly the eyes appear larger, deeper and more brilliant. "MAYBELLINE" makes scant eyebrows and lashes appear naturally dark, long and luxuriant. Used regularly by beautiful girls and women everywhere. Unlike other preparations, absolutely greaseless, will not spread or smear on the face. Perfectly harmless. Each dainty box contains mirror and brush for applying. Two shades. Brown for Blondes, Black for Brunettes.

At all good Drug and Dept. Stores. Accept only genuine MAYBELLINE and your satisfaction is assured.

Gone, happily, is the day of sanguinary pictures in the dining room! Instead of slaughtered fish and game, exquisite gems of the floral kingdom now adorn the walls. Usually, the pictures are in a low key; with the rich, glowing shades of flower and foliage measurably toned down by a black background. As an over-mantel decoration in a paneled dining room, these pictures are particularly effective: as Christmas gifts, they are ideal.

Furniture for Christmas Giving

is never a trifling matter: to select draperies for gifts is a delicate operation calling upon every resource of discernment which the donor possesses. The new designs are beguiling—too beguiling, almost: and certainly too varied in hue and pattern for any ease in selecting. But, when just the right fabric can be found, the effort involved is not in vain. Best of all, drapery-fabrics are sufficiently durable to carry Christmas not merely from one year to the next, but on through several years: constituting a gift that will long give pleasure to the recipient. And the immediate pleasure of unfolding yard upon yard of colorful fabric is something especially gracious to confer upon any favored friend.

The giving of furniture is both rational and wholesome: nevertheless, it is not to be lightly entered into. It is something to approach very slowly: and the actual selection of the gift of furniture must be marked by equal deliberation. Remember, while we may believe implicitly in our own sense of the fitness of things, the prospective recipient of our gifts may be endowed with quite different tastes in home-furnishing. Even irrespective of any divergence in tastes, we should go slowly in choosing furniture: bearing in mind that, next to the house itself, furniture, whether it be good or bad, is usually the longest-enduring feature of any home; and that, as such, its selection is not a matter of momentary impulse.

Health and the Home

ground small between your upper and lower teeth and well mixed with saliva. You have heard that before?—Yes, I know you have, but you forgot it last Christmas and I am writing to remind you so that you will not forget this time.

HOW MANY COURSES FOR CHRISTMAS DINNER?

Two. Two courses is enough for Christmas Dinner. And don't have them both heavy. If you are among the small number of Canadians who will see a Turkey on Christmas Day, take my advice and omit the stuffing unless the digestions of all the family are A.1. The turkey with no dressing has a gamey flavour much superior to the stuffed turkey. And don't have the gravy too rich.

How would cranberry tarts do for dessert? You would feel a great deal brighter in the afternoon.

THE CHRISTMAS PUDDING

You see, the Christmas Pudding is a great institution but there are mixed up in it more than six different food-stuffs and that makes it indigestible.

Don't have the black variety of Christmas pudding, unless you are sure that you have sufficient self-control to stop at the first teaspoonful. Have a light-brown pudding. I don't want to abolish Christmas puddings, but a little helping is enough. You can have a little more to-morrow when you have no turkey.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS

Now on December First, take your money and don't try to do too much with it. Don't you love to get a real Christmas Letter from a real friend, instead of a gift?—Well then, be the real friend that writes a Christmas Letter instead of buying a gift. That will enable you to make a better use of your Christmas money in making gifts to the people you ought to give something to, and if you make your list on December First and organize your plans, then your health should not be upset by Christmas, as the health of so many people, young and old, was upset last year. Don't try to do too much. Keep within your strength. And don't leave anything to do on Christmas Eve if you can help it.

Enjoy Christmas Eve.

A round hand bag of black and Jac rose picot, number seven—seven yards. Number 160 is used in lining. The bag is made on a foundation of two circles of buckram, 6½ inches in diameter. The loops of picot are laid on in a circle, the bottom row of loops being 7 inches long and doubled and the top row cut 5 inches and doubled.

This girdle is made of brown and orange velvet ribbon and requires 5 yards. Around the waist use 37 inches of the ribbon (brown) and 45 (orange). The brown swathes the waist in pleated fashion and the orange is folded over the brown on the bias, giving a twisted effect. The square pillow (below) is made of fancy Jacquard ribbon, combined with black Hyglo satin. The fancy material is 9 inches wide, cut into 4 triangles whose long sides are twelve inches, making a total use of 1 3/8 yards of ribbon.

Musical Christmas Gifts

them or what a real resource in the way of happiness such a gift may be.

The ingratiating phase of this invention is that it enables a Christmas-giver even with a very lean purse to make a present that is acceptable; not a gimcrack notion to be thrown away in a week or so. Even if the present is but a seventy-five cent dance record it is almost certain that the recipient will get fun out of it, far exceeding that imparted by the average old-fashioned gift of a pin cushion or a box of candy. Another significant fact is that in giving records, you have an almost unlimited field of selection in which to meet the taste of the person for whom the present is intended. If young and frivolous, there is an immense range of frothy but exhilarating jazz. And I may say in passing that jazz is not half so bad as some pedants assert. I know of a few musicians of world-wide celebrity who enjoy it very much. In fact there is an orchestral conductor of established greatness who this past summer would listen to nothing else, while on a vacation in Canada. It was his relaxation after his strenuous labors in the interpretation of serious music, while on active duty. Other celebrities, especially pianists of high rank, share his tastes. So you can buy a jazz record with a clear conscience. On the other hand, if the person you wish to remember with a gift is of definite musical tastes there are thousands of beautiful vocal, violin and other types of serious records on which to draw.

* * *

LET us turn to the person who possesses some actual musical accomplishment; who plays or sings for his or her own pleasure. There is a type of Christmas present suitable for such an individual that is too frequently neglected. Countless thousands of books are given as Christmas presents every year; but how seldom is a book of musical selections chosen as a Yuletide gift. You give someone a new novel. It is read within two or three days and then put on the shelf. Its message is, at least for a considerable time to come, ended for the recipient. This is perhaps less true of the average book of poetry or essays. But if a person plays or sings, no printed page of literature will give anything like the same volume and continuity of pleasure, as a book of Schumann's songs, or of Grieg's charming piano compositions, or a fine anthology of works in some specific form. A well bound book of good music, or even an operatic score of some standard work, will be held in affection for years by anyone of musical talent. This is a tip for parents who have musical daughters or young men who have musical sweethearts. A volume of lasting delight can be bought for less than the cost of a bunch of flowers. And the pleasure it gives will be shared by others for an indefinite period.

The type of Christmas presents I have been talking of, are those which would be prized in any average household; and also by young people "boarding out". And, as I have insisted on various occasions, this type of giving should not by any means be confined to civic communities. The reproducing instrument has done more to lighten farm life and make it more attractive, than, if possible it has done for people in the towns and cities. And with regard to records or books of music, such gifts are even more welcome to the girl out in the country who is fond of music or perhaps plays the piano, than to the city girls. It should not be difficult to imagine what pleasure can be conveyed by a book of good songs sent to a farmhouse where one member of the household is able to play; or what fun the whole neighborhood circle will get out of it.

There are also special cases where some individual aspires to play the violin or one or other of the less serious types of stringed instruments; and for such it is not difficult to know what would be the most acceptable present—if the donor can in Wawashene, finds that his housekeeper has matrimonial intentions. So he welcomes the coming of his nieces and a nephew, who turn the old manse into a scene of youthful revelry. There is a social service ideal back of all the fun, and we finally see Sawdust Alley transformed into something resembling a place fit for human habitation. The most refreshing character in the book is Mr. McWhirter, the sexton, who declares:

"Weemin! Tod! Whit wes the Almighty thinkin' about that He made so many o' the cratur? It's weemin here! An' weemin there! An' weemin yonder! Weemin everywhere but in their hame! Ay! Oh, no! They canna bide at hame an' raise their bairns; they must be fleein' hereaway, thereaway, hither and skither, raisin' the de'il!" (Published by McClelland and Stewart, Toronto. Price, $2.00).

Mr. Archie P. McKishnie knows much of the life in woods and on the lakes and streams of Ontario, and in his latest book, "Openway," he writes entertainingly of his many acquaintances. Bennie, who lived at "Openway," a rough clearing on the northern shore of Kent County Ontario, had established a kind of sanctuary of his own for some of the animals. The stories of his various friends, from Cresty, the wood duck, to Spray-coat, the wonderful fox, are told in a fashion which should please any young reader. (Published by Hodder and Stoughton, Toronto. Price, $1.25).

"Including Mother," by Margaret Ashburn, is a charming story of two girls and their mother, who forsake the noisy city and find a pleasant home in the small community of Schuyler. Their adventures in settling down and furnishing the house are highly entertaining and remind one of "Little Women" days. The mother, curiously enough, is the irresponsible member of the family and takes many years to "grow up." Here is a wholesome and home-like story which most girls will enjoy. (Published in Toronto, by the Macmillan Company. Price, $1.75).

"Puppy Dogs' Tales" and stories of other Animal Friends, selected and edited by Frances Kent, is a book which will appeal to all lovers of the dog. This is really a highly enjoyable anthology, in which we meet many old friends. The illustrations are of the happiest order, and you will be thanked most sincerely by any discriminating person who receives this book as a Christmas gift. (Published in Toronto, by the Macmillan Company. Price, $2.00).

The Macmillan Company is justly famous for the publication of beautiful books. At this season, there are several of their books which are a delight either to read or survey. There is an edition de luxe of "The Crock of Gold," by James Stephens, with drawings by Wilfred Jones, that would be hailed with joy by anyone who cares for fairy tales which are literature and illustrations which are such as Puck might draw were he given a pencil or such as Ariel might paint were he given a palette. (Price, $2.50). Then there is a charming book by Padriac Colum (price, $2.00) called "The Children Who Followed the Piper," for which Dugald Walker has done the fantastic and whimsical illustrations. Of course you remember the Pied Piper and you have often wondered what became of the children who followed him. Padriac Colum tells you all about them—or as much as any mortal should

CANDIES for CHRISTMAS

By Frances M. McNally

Chocolate Caramels:—Three cups sugar, one cup butter, one cup milk, one tablespoon corn syrup, one cup molasses, for squares chocolate, one teaspoon vanilla, one-half teaspoon lemon extract. Put the sugar, butter, milk, corn syrup, molasses and chocolate in sauce pan and boil, stirring constantly until 252 degrees Fahrenheit is reached. Add the extracts and pour into buttered tins. When cool cut into pieces with buttered scissors.

Candies with Special Texture Sea Foam:—Three cups light brown sugar, one cup water, one tablespoon vinegar whites of two eggs, one teaspoon vanilla

Marshmallows:—Two tablespoons granulated gelatine, one and one-quarter cups water, two cups granulated sugar, one teaspoon vanilla. Soak gelatine in one-half of the water for five minutes. Put the remaining water and the sugar in a sauce pan, bring to the boiling point and let boil until 230 degrees is reached (soft ball). Add soaked gelatine and let stand until luke warm. Add the flavouring and beat until mixture becomes white and thick. Pour into pans dusted with powdered sugar, having mixture at least one inch in thickness and let stand until thoroughly chilled. Turn out on a board, cut in squares and roll in powdered sugar, in cocoanut or in chopped nuts.

Divinity Candy:—Two cups sugar, one cup water, a speck of cream of tartar, one-third cup corn syrup, whites of three eggs, one teaspoon orange extract, one-half teaspoon rose, one-quarter teaspoon almond, one cup chopped nuts. Dissolve the sugar in the water, add cream of tartar and corn syrup, and boil to 240 degrees. Beat the whites of the eggs until stiff and pour one-half of syrup over them beating constantly. Boil the remaining syrup to 250 degrees and beat it into the mixture. When it begins to stiffen add the extracts and the nuts and pour into buttered pans. When cool mark in squares.

one teaspoon rose extract, one cup nut meats. Put sugar, water, and vinegar in saucepan and heat gradually to boiling point, stirring only until sugar is dissolved. Boil until temperature of 250 degrees is reached (hard ball). Remove at once from fire and when syrup stops bubbling pour gradually on the stiffly beaten egg whites. Continue beating until the mixture will hold its shape, then add the extracts and nuts. Drop with teaspoon on oiled paper or buttered tins.

An Uncooked Candy, Parisian Sweets:—Two cups stoned dates, two cups seedless raisins, one cup preserved ginger, one-half cup figs, one cup candied cherries, one cup chopped walnuts, one cup Brazil nuts, one cup shredded cocoanut, one teaspoon vanilla, one teaspoon lemon juice, powdered sugar. Put fruits and nut meats through chopper twice, then add vanilla and lemon juice and knead in enough sugar to make very stiff. Roll out with rolling pin one inch in thickness and cut into any desired shapes and roll in colored sugar.

“$60 more a month!”

“LAST night I came home with great news—a $60 increase in salary! I took the money out of my pocket and asked Mary to count it. You should have seen her face light up when she found the extra $60.00. I think she was even happier than I was, for it was the third increase in a year.

Today I am manager of my department—earning more money than I ever thought it would be possible for me to make. I owe it all to the training I received from the International Correspondence Schools. That little coupon was the means of changing my whole life.”

HOW much longer are you going to wait before taking the step that is bound to bring you more money? Isn't it better to start now than to wait for years and then realize what the delay has cost you? One hour each night spent with the I. C. S. in your own home will prepare you for the position you like better.

Do not let another priceless hour go to waste! Without cost or obligation, let us prove that we can help you. Mark and mail this coupon.

The Christmas Child

BY KATHERINE TYNAN

THE house is a big house in a great square. Shivering people passing by glance at its lit windows and envy the owners. There is little that money can give these two, the elderly man and woman sitting in the plainest room the house affords, each side a dying fire. The man's face is strongly marked and haggard, the woman's full of sadness but with a quiet and sweet strength redeeming its plainness. Oddly enough the thoughts of both are centring about the same thing, the cradle that once stood on the hearth between them when they were young and poor and exquisitely happy—long before the briefless barrister dreamt of being John Armytage, K.C., who might be a judge if he were willing to sacrifice his great position at the Bar.

Suddenly the man spoke.
"I had the delusion for a moment, Mary, that it was thirty years ago and you were stitching away at the little baby clothes for the boy."
"They are baby clothes," she said, "for the poor Christmas children."
"I envy you your faith and hope, Mary," he said. "If I could forget only for one moment the bitterness of having no child to work for! Piers should be here to help me. I dreamt last night again of my case-book, how it grew and grew until it shut out the sun and the stars. I shall have to give up I foresee; it is too much for me, and when I give up I shall begin to die. Piers would have helped me."

She glanced at him with great pity in her face, where peace brooded like a dove.

"Poor John!" she said softly.
"You forgive me, Mary, though it was I who drove him away by my pride and harshness. I had no right to bind him by my ambitions. The girl was a lady and a good girl. It was I who was in the wrong."

He gulped something in his throat as he said it. He had never said so much before.

"Oh," she said with a gentle ardour, "there is nothing to forgive. There is only love between me and you."

"Not a grave," he said, "where once was a cradle?"

"Only love," she repeated.

"I think I will go to bed," he said.

"I am very tired."

A confused jangle of bells broke out in street and square. The woman lifted her face, and there was a light on it.

"The Christ-child has come home," she said, "though our son never may."

He came and kissed her and laid a weary face on her shoulder.

"Poor Mary!" he said. "You were made for motherhood; and I have robbed you of your son and your son's sons."

She lifted her hand for silence and listened. Someone was knocking at the great double doors of the house. The knocking came thunderously through the sweet jangle of bells.

"Who can it be," she said, "that knocks so late? Christmas Eve, too, when all the people are in bed or in the churches."

"It is news of some sort," he answered; his head lifted to listen.

The knocking had ceased now. They heard the slamming of the hall door through the silent house. There were footsteps on the heavily-carpeted stairs. They stood side by side, each mind full

Christmas Puzzle—Find Father

The Vanity Box

by Prim Rose

CHRISTMAS time and the Vanity Box have ever so much to say to each other. In fact, Santa Claus has shown distinct "leanings" in the past few years towards the Vanity Box and all things pertaining thereto. If you wish to please the modern girl, something for the dressing table is almost sure to charm. If the object of your Christmas benefaction is collecting for a "set," be careful how you add hand mirror or brush to the dainty array, for she may have a decided preference in the matter of ivory, amber or silver. Don't have any engraving done until you discover Milady's taste in the matter. Indeed, it is better to leave the whole subject of engraving to the choice of the user of the dressing table. French ivory has been justly popular a great variety, and we are sure you will be careful again in procuring just the kind which someone has been longing for. Then, there are combs to buy and we are glad the old-time gold-backed affair has disappeared, for it was expensive and usually loose in the teeth. At any rate, the teeth vanished with amazing rapidity and left the possessor to survey a thin rim of gold which was all that the comb had left. The combs of ivory are so delightfully clean in appearance that it is no wonder they have been a useful ornament to many a dressing table. Speaking of combs, you are aware of course, that the Spanish comb is the most fashionable adornment which the feminine head can have. [Such beautiful things they are, these Spanish affairs which "belong" with a large and sweeping fan. So, if you wish to bestow an especially welcome present, select a Spanish comb and be sincerely thanked.

Silver always holds its shining own at Christmas time. There are the prettiest trifles for the dressing table which display enamel lids in floral and landscape designs. Here you find a quaint silver box with lid looking as if it had just come from Holland, for there is the windmill, ancient and cumbrous, in blue on the small receptacle which just holds a tiny puff and a few flakes of powder.

If you are going to bestow a box of powder or a bottle of perfume, once more the warning is sounded:—do not get what will not be acceptable. There are few women who have not decided preferences in the matter of perfume, soap or powder—and it is too bad to send rose-scented sets of delightful toilet equipment to those who would prefer violet or verbenia. We used to be admonished not to send a gift of perfume or soap, as such might be considered too suggestive by the recipient. However, we have reached such a pitch of artistic excellence in the production of these articles that it is not considered any longer that a personal hint is conveyed by such a present.

There are most sumptuous boxes put up by many firms containing all these toilet requisites that we have mentioned, and the price of these dainty gifts is not alarming. Remember, too, that there are perfumes and soaps produced on this continent which are just as alluring as anything which Paris has sent us. The time is past when we rely on Europe for such dainty goods.

Towels also, have passed out of the region of gifts in doubtful taste. As soon as an article reaches a certain standard of fineness, it is no longer regarded as merely a necessity. Assuredly, the fringed or embroidered and monogrammed towel is dainty enough to be regarded as an elaborate little present. Be sure, in bestowing anything in the nature of linen, to be most particular in the matter of quality. It is better far to give one guest towel of an exquisite softness than to give a pair of the coarse variety. The extremely ordinary linen we may buy for ourselves, but the gift should have pleasing and lasting quality.

Then there are always dainty sachets to be made or bought. Last year there was a fashion for a whole cluster of small during the last few years, but, once more, let me say, consult the personal taste of the one who is to receive. There are so many pretty trinkets which belong to the dressing table that almost every purse is suited in the prices charged. There are wee French ivory vanity boxes, with a touch of forget-me-not or wild rose on the lid which cost less than two dollars. There are pretty glass salve jars with silver tops, which will hold just enough cold cream or the vanishing kind, to keep you fair and fresh to look upon as you depart for a fortnight's visit.

If you are buying a brush, be sure that the bristles are good and that you are purchasing a useful, as well as a sightly article. In brushes, there may be found know. There is a third volume, so alluring that we wish to have it for a real bookshelf friend—and that is "Rainbow Gold," Poems Old and New, selected for Boys and Girls, by Sara Teasdale, with illustrations by Dugald Walker. Here, indeed, is treasure trove, which either old or young may find enriching. William Allingham is here, with his fairy dreams, and Tennyson tells of "The Lady of Shalott," Walter de la Mare discourses of "Berries," and John Keats sings of "Meg Merrilies." From "Kubla Khan" to "Auld Daddy Darkness," every poem is an old friend, to be enjoyed again, or a new one to rejoice over—and the youngster who does not like "Rainbow Gold" should be apprenticed to a plumber.

From Hodder and Stoughton come several publications of notable merit. Foremost of these is Leonard Merrick's "To Tell You the Truth," ($1.75), a collection of such stories as seldom find their bright way to a dreary world. Read them all, from "Mademoiselle Ma Mere" to "Florimond and Frisonette," and you will find a new grace, pathos and gayety in life. There is another book by Margaret Pedler, who wrote, "The Moon Out of Reach." This novel, "The Vision of Desire," ($1.75) has a couplet from Omar Khayyam for a beginning and the conventional happy ending of a course of greatly-troubled true love. Then we have a novel by Frederick Bending, "The Shadow's Edge," ($1.75) which brings a hero of the Mounted Police into the foreground once more with a heroine of the name of Joyce Chetwood, who has more than her share of adventures before she finds out who she really is. This is a typical romance of the remote north. Anne Elizabeth Wilson, of the Hodder, Stoughton staff has compiled, in "Canadian Treasury Reciter," a highly useful little book (price, 30 cents), which will be appreciated in many a community.

"The Turned-About Girls," by Beulah Marie Dix, (price, $2.00), is published by the Macmillan Company, Toronto and is a delightful story of two young girls who "change places" and have a most interesting time puzzling their respective relatives.

* * *

"Out For Character," (published by the Ryerson Press, Toronto, price, $1.00), is a discourse in twenty-six chapters by various writers, on the incalculable importance of self-control in building up a strong and clean manhood. The book is a wholesome and appealing study of those elements which make for estimable character.

* * *

"Verse and Reverse" is a compilation by the Toronto Women's Press Club of poems written by the members of that organization, and shows that even in a city which, according to Mr. Kipling, is consumingly commercial, the Muse is not without honor. From the many verses, we choose two stanzas from "The Christmas Guest," by Lilian Leveridge as suited to the Yuletide spirit.

"Sing the songs he loved the best—
Songs of mirth and joy—
Ere upon his hero-quest,
Seeking service, finding rest,
Went our blithe bright boy.

Put a flower at his place—
He will understand.

In its sweetness love may trace
Visions of a vanished face, Touch a vanished hand."

Those who like color will delight in Helen Merrill Egerton's "English Mari-golds", and will wish that Mrs. Egerton would write more frequently. Louise Mason has a gallant snatch of song in "The Jester's Creed." Frances Williamson's "The Guest" is truly a magic cry of welcome, and L. M. Montgomery sings a merry "Spring Song." This booklet, daintily bound in powder blue, may be obtained from Miss C. M. Storey, 71 Richmond St., W., Toronto.

Musical Christmas Gifts

afford it. With the widespread growth of new methods of interesting children in music by musical play and games, I expect to see important developments in the direction of creating really musical toys instead of purely noise-making affairs. Such developments are yet in their pioneer stage and hardly well enough advanced for discussion. But taking the subject of Christmas gifts as a whole, I think that it must be quite plain to every one, that musical merchandise offers countless solutions of the problem, "What shall I give for Christmas?"

The Christmas Child

of the same thought, tense with expectation.

The door opened and a servant, huddled into his clothes, appeared.

"A gentleman to see you, sir," he said; and went off yawning.

Mrs. Armitage said afterwards that if it had not been Piers who came the shock would have killed her; she had made so sure. A tall man, wrapped in a heavy cloak, pale and travel-worn; was it Piers? "Mother," he said. "Father, we have come home."

Before either of them could touch him he had to relieve himself of his burden, a young child of about three years old, golden-haired, and smiling in his sleep.

"This is your grandson, mother," he said, laying the child in her arms. He was beautiful and plump as a little Christ-child of Murillo.

"He is your namesake, father," he said. "There are only the two of us now."

The two men shook hands with the air of men in a dream.

"Oh!" cried Mary Armitage, with the feel of the child between her arms and her breast. "Christmas has brought the child."

Sir Ernest Shackleton was a wonderfully modest man, and it was hard to realise while with him, until one got to speak about his exploits, that he was one of the biggest explorers of the generation. He was quite unlike another explorer who never lost an opportunity of telling you what he had done.

"I've been to places so cold," the boastful explorer once observed, "that you literally couldn't feel your hands and feet. One had to think, to prevent one's mind from turning into a block of ice. The breath nearly froze as it came out of the mouth. And, if I had the chance, I'd go to those regions again to-morrow."

"Well," chipped in one of his hearers, not to be beaten, "I take a cold bath every morning!"

2. It cleans thoroughly any floor-surface—from thick rugs to bare hardwood or linoleum, even concrete!
3. It is the most sanitary to use.
4. It has the simplest, most easily connected attachments.
5. It cleans by air alone—no revolving brushes, belts or gears to get out of order or diminish the efficiency.
6. It gives the most service per dollar of cost.

Sent Free

Your copy of the interesting book, "The Modern Method of Cleaning," is ready. Tells how to clean rugs, carpets, hangings, ceilings, concrete floors, etc. Just write, "Send Booklet"—copy will be sent free.

OF COURSE, mother thinks it's just a childish prank—but watch her smile when the real reason for all the significant glances and mysterious whisperings of the past few days stands revealed!

Weeks before the big day arrived a host of things large and small were discussed and eliminated one by one. For, this year, it had to be a really worth-while gift—something that mother would be proud to show her friends.

A Royal Electric Cleaner was dad's happy solution of the problem.

Did mother really want her Royal? Well, rather! Secretly she had studied the superior features of the Royal—it was just the cleaner she had always hoped to find—but she had hardly dared expect that one would be really hers so soon. Yet there it was, thanks to dad's and the children's thoughtfulness,—ready at her bidding to make housecleaning easier for her through all the days to come.

Perhaps a Royal would also be a happy solution to your Christmas gift problem. The nearest Royal Dealer will be glad to give you complete information and demonstrate the Royal's superior cleaning ability — without obligating you in any way.

Cleans By Air Alone!

When Santa Claus Cleans House

BY A. YULE LOG

IT was two or three nights before Christmas and Santa Claus was taking a kind of reconnoitre trip before he started out with those huge bales of toys for the twenty-fourth of December. He was in a practical mood for the jovial old saint; and he paused to look around at the clear, star-spangled sky before he took a slide down the chimney. "Nice clean sky," he murmured into his snowy beard. "Boreas swept it clear with that little flurry this afternoon."

It was a pleasant living-room into which Santa Claus dropped, with magazines and papers scattered about, as if the members of the family had been enjoying a quiet evening. There were stray bits of chiffon and silk, too, which looked like fragments from a bag or a leftover from a dainty thing in lingerie. With the deftest moves for such a plump old gentleman, Santa Claus swept some of the furniture aside and surveyed the room. "Just a touch-up will be appreciated here," he mused. He took out a shining key, noiselessly inserted it into the padlock on his pack and proceeded to take out something which looked a little like a sweeper in the dim light, but which moved faster than any old-time dust chaser ever dreamed of doing. "Now," said Santa Claus to himself, "if Morpheus will only keep the family asleep, I'll have the place looking like a new pin in no time."

Such a busy hour as Santa Claus spent in that house, while there came a low wail from the shining servant which was doing his bidding so deftly. Santa paused several times, for fear of waking the youngsters, and having them see the present for the housewife in an untimely hour. But the sleep in the House with Red Gables was sound that night, for everyone was tired with the first weariness of "getting ready for the Great Day." Bobby heard the noise in his sleep and dreamed that an aeroplane was sailing to him as a gift across the Christmas sky. Mother and Daddie were asleep too soundly to care for an after-midnight guest; and so Santa Claus worked on, enjoying every minute of his house-cleaning, until he had a whole bag of dust, to show how thoroughly he was cleaning. Walls, pictures, rugs and floors had received a magic touch and, behold, everything looked like new.

The good old saint appeared pleased with the results of a December house-cleaning and proceeded to talk to the Sandy Cat which had strayed from its box in the kitchen and had found a comfortable resting-place on the mat before the fire-place. "Curious," he said, "how long it took the world to find out just what would suit the housewife! I have been travelling across the sky for centuries and yet it did not enter the head of mankind to create what would make the home an easier place to live in. There was all manner of good cheer—which, of course, meant more work for someone; but there was very little thought of a gift which would mean a magical lightening of woman's work. I have brought new gowns and hats and sometimes a wonderful fur coat. Jewels there have been in a shining array—brighter than your eyes"—the Sandy Cat blinked at this and rolled over on the rug to yawn—but hardly ever has there been a thought for the work done by the women and how to make it lighter. For the last twenty years, though, curious things have been appearing in my pack—things with light inside of them and things which shed a wonderful glow when once they were attached to certain strange buttons and plaques on earth. From far places of the world, they have brought the force which the Greeks named for 'amber' and which has kept the old name of electricity.

The force began by lighting the streets and the houses and the churches and then it was trained until it would do almost anything. It will now light a tiny torch that you may carry in your hand to the cellar, or that you may turn on in the night to see whether all is well with the household." The Sandy Cat sat up and, in the dim light, his eyes looked like the gleam of an electric torch—only greener.

"Then," continued Santa Claus, "I was sent on all manner of strange errands with these affairs made from the force which the Greeks called 'amber.' I found my way into the kitchen and there I left an iron which turned the old-time drudgery into nothing but a picnic, with an electric friend to be used whenever the housewife chose. Then, one day, the wise ones who deal with the force thought that it was time to set the washing machine a-going and take the burden off poor old Monday. Of course, this made more work for me and I have been over-worked the last two or three years by the number of these imposing machines which I have carried to ever so many homes. They have meant gratitude unspeakable from the mother of the family who has seen the toils of years suddenly lightened and the little electric button turning on a domestic helper. Then I have found a further use which electric force is making—which simply goes all over the house, into every hole and corner, takes the dust out of rugs and chairs and curtains until there isn't a spot in the house which the Dust Demon may call his own."

The Sandy Cat here dug his forefeet into the rug in a positively vicious way, and Santa Claus threw a snowball at his ears. "Well, I must be going soon," said the Christmas saint, as he prepared to put that vacuum cleaner back in his pack. "However," he continued, "I thought I would just give this thing a trial myself to see how it worked. It is really all the women say, but I won't leave this to-night. I'll be calling again, in a few nights, and, I'll tell you what, I'll bring the very latest thing then and leave it with the attachments that will keep the housewife busy for a week. It is queer that it is only since the twentieth century began to spin around, that I have been bringing these delightful presents to brighten the eyes of the housewife and make the whole house sit up and look cleaner than it ever did before. It takes quite a while to wake the world up to what is most needed, but every home will soon have the proper cleaner now. It is just necessary for one woman to see another using the 'vacuum,' to make her realize that happiness will be incomplete till she has a little cleaner of her own."

The Sandy Cat made a dash for the bag and was almost padlocked in, before Santa had grasped his intentions. "No, you don't," he said firmly. "You have a very good home where you are and I am not going to take you where you may not be wanted. Now, that I have gone over everything, to show you how a vacuum cleaner works, I hope you will appreciate the importance of living in a household where things are cleaned in the proper way."

So, the Sandy Cat subsided on the rug, to dream of the fattest mouse that ever ran out of a pantry; and, when the family came down in the morning, everyone said: "Why, how bright it all looks!" And the mother of the family sighed and said: "I don't believe I'll have to clean this rug to-day after all. Dear me, I wish we had a vacuum cleaner!" But the Sandy Cat just opened his eyes and blinked at the husband, who was regarding the rug with a very Christmassy smile on his face.

The Unexpected

"Well!" she began, with feminine readiness, "Four years ago, before we were married, we lived near Ottawa, and one night Jim drove me to a concert in the city. On the way home, we talked of 'Two Scotch Courtships' and the conversation led to a proposal. So we said then, that if you ever came near our home, we were going to entertain you."

"And they lived happily ever afterwards," I quoted, feeling like a beneficent matrimonial bureau.

Many years after, at a concert in Hamilton, my friends came to greet me: "You don't remember me?" said the lady.

"Don't I? How's the Apple-blossom baby?"

"He has just passed his Entrance Examination into High School," said the mother of the baby, rather regretfully.

And so, the serial stories add their chapters, one by one, and I go on rejoicing that so many individuals and households and audiences have enlarged the circumference of my world; and grateful that so many of the human family have been willing to share with me the humor, the beauty, the joys and the comforts of life.

to have married a relation of yours, Tom, dear.

The two stood looking tenderly down upon the fair young face, both hearts stirred by the pitiful story of that long dead romance.

"Poor old Uncle Thomas," murmured Tom, lifting his eyes from the miniature to the lovely face of his young wife.

"You don't need to pity your Uncle Thomas," came a sharp voice from the bed, "he was well looked after."

"Yes, sure," hastily agreed Tom, "you waited on him hand and foot. One would hear that big cane knocking if you were out of sight for a minute."

"A bad sprain" announced the Doctor, coming down to meet Tom and his wife in the hall, "She has a good nurse and in a—the sentence was cut short by the wild uproar created by Wong."

"Bustee! Bustee! Comee cellar! Heem no good!" shouted Wong whirling into the hall, his slippers flip-flapping an accompaniment to his repeated "Bustee, bustee!"

The trouble was not in the furnace but in the store room. The heavy wooden cork had blown out of a big jug of yeast, and had hit the ceiling with force, for yeast had been liberally splattered overhead, and the lively contents of the jug were smeared over shelves and floor.

"That cork hitting the ceiling was the knock that Agnes and I heard," declared Mrs. Villier, as Tom finished his account of the happening.

"Of course it was, and it will make Agnes McGee's Christmas a lot happier to know it. Won't you 'phone her right away, Anna, and tell me what she says."

"She said—'Thank God'—in a voice that nearly split my ear."

"It has been a lovely Christmas," murmured Mrs. Villier. "George and his wife were just as nice and friendly as they could be when they came to see me, and as for the young folks, they couldn't be nicer. I'm glad that I told Ethel Maud she could have that navy blue and gold and red china, Crown Derby, she calls it. I never thought it any great shakes. When I get able I'll go into Victoria and buy myself a pretty pink flowered tea set, and some nice new wicker furniture that won't have to be polished and everlastingly watched for scratches. Tom and Anna can have their choice of the mahogany, and there is plenty of silver for us all, but the clock stays here while I live. It is like an old friend, and I can hear it tick-tocking, tick-tocking and saying to me,—No forerunner, no forerunner. All's well, all's well."

NOW that we are dowered with the franchise, that we call spades spades and discuss the price of food and clothing in season and out with impunity, let us go a step further and give sensible gifts to our friends this Christmas. Please don't mistake my meaning and think I'm advising prosaic gifts. Heaven forbid! Gifts can be eminently sensible and yet not in the least prosaic. For instance, if Daughter who has a saddle horse should covet a riding habit, and Father decided to give her one for a Christmas gift, that would be a sensible thing to do and not in any sense prosaic.

Gifts We Might Give---Or Receive

BY CHARLOTTE M. STOREY

evening wear. For day time silk and wool mixtures are new and well liked by the discriminating person.

Gloves have always been a favored gift and one can never have too many pairs; so, when all else fails, a pair are sure to please, especially with gauntlet tops with contrasting trimmings, or a pair of those splendid wash cape gloves which are so nice for street wear, in cold they'd like white gloves or lovat stockings, or a bead purse or perhaps a pretty bead necklace. Often they're not half as sensible under the skin.

Women who are "handy with their needle" rarely get gifts of needlework. Very often they give away all they make and have none of the pretty little gim-cracks that are dear to almost every woman's heart and which would be prized as a gift—a handkerchief with a tatted edge, a camisole with a crocheted top, a knitted bag with crocheted flowers on it. The average woman—when clothes are under consideration women are very much on an average—will rejoice in a blouse now that we have found out that we cannot dispense with this very useful article of apparel. The only formality required is to find out whether the recipient would prefer a tailored crepe de Chine for a sports suit or a jacquette made of velvet, klo-ka or quilted satin, or a dressy model of Canton crepe and radium lace of the over-blouse persuasion.

As I walked up the street this afternoon looking in the shop windows—window-shopping it is called—I came to the conclusion that this article would fall short of its mark unless it contained some reference to shoes which were displayed in such array that even a Prince might be able to select a pair for a Princess.

It will be joyful news to those who do not like the very flat heels to know that they are passe except for youth. We all admit readily enough that flat heels look well, but what anguish they cause when one has been used to wearing moderately high ones! We shall ambulate much more comfortably in the present styles which are about an inch and a half even for every-day wear than in those with the unsophisticated heels.

Nearly all the shoes one sees in the windows now, seem to have a Christmas-present look—black with red leather trimmings for the young girl who wears a "Regulation" suit to school; patent leather pumps with colored stitching and infantile straps; black or brown suede pumps with fringed tongue; black satin with rhinestone buckles, dance slippers of silver or gold—they all seem to invite one to come in and take them away to be rolled in tissue paper and tied with red ribbon with a sprig of holly.

A favorite section of any women's wear store at Christmas is the lingerie department. There one finds netheralls and kick-ins, a kind of triple alliance combining skirt and camisole or brassiere and an undergarment, or the more simple two-piece suits of crepe de Chine in delicate pink or orchid, lace and ribbon trimmed, with a delicate touch of hand embroidery, a costume slip, negligee garters, garters with a tiny purse or vanity pouchette concealed under the shirred ribbon casing, boudoir caps and dainty nun's veiling gowns—white embroidered in pink and a draw string at the waist, but see them for yourself!

A very acceptable gift to one who has a jacquette would be one of the new pleated silk or satin skirts hung on a sleeveless waist designed to go with this kind of a blouse. The thing that will please any young girl who goes to parties would be one of those fillets made of tinsel leaves in dainty flower colors like the pink of a rose, the blue of a forget-me-not or the yellow of a marigold. There are also coral colored galalith back combs, large jet ones and tortoise shell for the

Berthas of filmy beauty

It used to be a very delicate matter to give a gift of clothing to any but a relative or a very intimate friend; but with our modern endowments and ideals it is considered in just as good taste to give something that is obviously needed—or at least desired—as to ransack the stores to find something of doubtful desirability.

I remember once hearing a friend say that her uncle had given her two pairs of silk stockings and how rather shocked some of her friends were. But that was when silk stockings were much less common than they are now, and when to have even one pair was to be distinguished. Now-a-days the gift of a pair of silk stockings is very acceptable no matter from whom they come—at least one woman may give another silk hosiery feeling sure the gift will be acceptable. Indeed, if a story that was current at the close of the war be true, silk stockings are a royal gift. The story goes that the heir to Britain's throne was in France and was going home to England for Christmas. He was puzzled to know what to give the Princess Mary for a present. He was rather chummy with a Canadian officer and the two tried to think of a suitable gift, with but little success. Finally the Prince exclaimed: "I have it, I'll take her a pair of silk stockings. Mother hasn't let her have a pair since before the war." The story is told but not vouched for by the writer.

If the hose one selects are to go with an evening gown and one is not sure of getting a perfect match, better buy white ones and they can be dyed the right shade. Lace inserts on the instep, also embroidered insteps are nice for weather. Heavy fabric gloves have gauntlet or long cuffs and are also trimmed with contrasting colors. Long white kid gloves make a most acceptable gift to her who has use for them, and most young girls have at some time or other.

There's all kinds of scope for one's originality in planning Christmas gifts, and a friend of mine has decided upon something which I'm sure is quite original—at any rate it hasn't been done very often before. There is a household containing an old-fashioned sized family—a baker's dozen plus Mother and Dad, to whom my friend always plays Santa Claus. Thinking up something different for each one is quite a contract, so this year she got a bolt of pink flannelette and she's going to make nighties and pyjamas and myjamas for every one of them. Fancy the fun there'll be when they open up the parcels on Christmas morning; even Dad'll have his pink flannelette. "Gee, Mother, me too. Well what d'ye know about that?" he'll say most likely, and down deep in her heart mother'll be glad that Dad wasn't left out because planning sleeping garments for such a household must be something of a problem and one that it's nice to have someone settle for you. I hope they don't see this for it's to be a great surprise.

There are some people to whom we give doubtful praise when we say they are so reliable and sensible. To these people we always give something pitifully sensible and reliable, when dollars to doughnuts, they are longing for something a bit frivolous or at least a little bit sentimental. If we give them gloves or hosiery we get black, when perhaps older person and bracelets, pins and necklaces without number offering a selection for old or young; grave or gay. Some of the crystal beads have a facet like a diamond and amber is the fashionable color this year just as green was a season or two. Narrow moire ribbon is used for fancy beads which are grouped and fine cord is used for glass and composition pendants. In selecting gifts, one should not overlook the bag department. It is here you can find gifts at all prices and for all tastes from that of Sally in our Alley to the Princess to whom we seem to be harking back quite frequently tonight.

ABOUT THE BELROBE

Dressmaking consists of four things: (1) Cutting. The Belrobe Method shows a woman exactly how to lay each piece of her particular pattern on the particular width of suitable material which she wishes to purchase. The specific information (not general or average) all told in pictures. (2) Seaming. Showing in progressive pictures exactly how the pieces go together for each specific garment for which the Belrobe Method is individually created. (3) Fitting. The Belrobe Method gives simple guidance moire silk designed for the woman golfer to carry small change in for the caddy. It is moderate in price and is suspended from a fine cord which is tied in a loop large enough for the hand to slip through. Girls like beauty boxes and the bag departments have many varieties while those of more mature years like the English bag made of soft leather which is commodious and yet not clumsy and always looks smart. This is what the well-groomed English woman delights in carrying on her shopping expeditions.

Here are shown the latest designs in necklaces, ornaments to catch the side drape and on the right (bottom) a dainty golf purse

One might write of the pretty fur hats which the milliners are beginning to show to wear with fur coats; one might also mention certain luxurious fur coats but these are things that naturally suggest themselves to those who are in a position to buy them for some member of the family needing or wanting one, so that it is superfluous to mention them, but you may be interested in something I heard to-day about muffs. A Fifth Avenue, on necessary adjustments, showing when and where fitting is to be done. The Belrobe makes the work easy. (4) Finishing. (And this is the most important of all), the Belrobe Method shows a woman the fine points of finishing each separate garment.

The other pattern companies have made one and only one layout heretofore to answer for each pattern, without variation for size and with one width of material only. You will please bear in mind especially that each individual pattern has a special picture story for that one pattern, in each size, and that the user is shown how to lay her pattern for all suitable widths to cut without waste and "with the grain" of the cloth. And as for the putting-together section and the directions for fitting and for finishing, nothing ever done has even approached these valuable features of the Belrobe Method. The Belrobe is included only with Standard-Designer Patterns.

How We Made $200⁰⁰ Extra in Four Months — Right at Home

Mrs. A. A. Clark's record of success with her auto Knitter is so remarkable that we have asked her to tell about it in her own words, for the help and inspiration of Auto Knitter workers everywhere. Few owners of Auto Knitter machines can give the time and effort needed to make such unusual earnings, but men and women all over the country constantly add many dollars to their incomes every month—in spare hours only. Wouldn't even $5.00 a week extra be welcome to YOU? Then find out how Auto Knitter Workers make money—under our "Guaranteed Wage Plan."

By Mrs A. A. Clark

When one reaches the position where it seems as though everything is a rank failure, it is indeed a grand, glorious feeling to finally grasp a real opportunity and realize that you have at last "made good." That has been our experience with the Auto Knitter.

Three years ago, filled with high hopes and having a reasonable amount of capital, my husband and I started to farm a rented quarter, fully prepared to make a fortune. Well, we did—for the other fellow. First year—dried out. Second year—good crop but no price for grain, and to make matters worse we had gone heavily in debt for feed for the stock through the long hard winter that intervened.

Meanwhile, I had been trying to find some means of helping out the situation. Finally, I read about the plan for earning money at home by knitting socks on the Auto Knitter, and what was of even greater interest, the offer to take and pay for all the standard socks I could make.

I told my husband about it but he was not as much interested as I was. He said there was sure to be some string to it somewhere and he would have nothing to do with it. Well, the summer went by without much improvement in our affairs. I had been keeping in touch with the Auto Knitter people, however, and when I talked it over with my husband once more he finally decided that we had better try it. Just as soon as he could get his wages drawn up he sent the order for the machine.

The machine arrived and he unpacked it for me, and I noticed as soon as he got a good look at it that he seemed more favorably impressed. "If it works as well as it looks, it is O.K.," he said, and was quite anxious to see it going. I took my time and made sure of each move and very soon I could make socks quite easily. When the yarn we had coming arrived I was ready to do real work. As soon as I had half a dozen pairs of socks made, my husband took them to town and sold them all in less than one hour for $1.00 per pair.

We had planned to send the whole output to the company, but when we saw what a good article the machine could produce and how readily they sold, we changed our plans and decided to build up a good local trade. We sold six dozen pairs to local stores easily, getting $9.00 per dozen for them. After moving into town we put an ad. in the local paper, describing our product and also offering to knit for patrons from their own yarn.

We soon had so many orders that we were compelled to use the best yarn we could get locally, as the distance from Toronto made too long a wait and we were anxious to build up a reputation for our work in anticipation of another year, when we could start early in the season.

In all we have made, as near as we can check up, over $200.00 this last winter.

After seeing what the Auto Knitter could do, we got another machine, so we now keep one on standard work and use the other on orders for boys' and girls' stockings and odd size orders. Next fall we intend to hire a girl to do the housework and we will stock up with good yarn early in the season and make a regular business of it. We believe our experience this season justifies our expectations.

Outside of the few odd jobs my husband got to do this winter, our two machines have paid our rent, our living, and also reduced our obligations by $80.00, and we consider that good when we have had them such a short time—approximately four months.

With a more definite idea of how to go about it, as well as fuller knowledge of and faith in our equipment, we have every reason to hope for a much better showing next year. A very conservative estimate will give us $250.00 for this year's work, getting off to a poor start at that. We plan on $750.00 next year and will start the ball rolling by exhibiting our goods at the local fair within easy reach of us, and by using the local newspaper columns.

When I compare my husband's present cheerful optimism with his depression of four months ago I am fully convinced that the age of miracles is not passed.

Mrs. A. A. Clark, Alberta.

Why Not Let the Auto Knitter Help YOU?

As soon as you have an Auto Knitter in your home, and have become proficient in using it, you will have a means of solving your extra-money problem. This is the way:

The Auto Knitter enables you to make all-wool socks that find a ready sale everywhere. You knit these socks, following standard directions furnished with your machine, but you do not have to sell them yourself unless you wish. Not at all!

Simply send the finished socks to us in Toronto, in large or small shipments, as you find convenient. By return mail you receive a money order in payment of your wages for making the socks, at a fixed rate per dozen pairs, and also the same weight of new yarn that you used in knitting the hosiery sent to us. The yarn remains your property and is constantly replaced.

Not a Promise but a Contract

To every owner of an Auto Knitter we give a signed "Work Contract" which obligates us to carry out our part of the agreement for five years, whenever you wish to take advantage of it. Some Auto Knitter workers have been sending us their entire output for several years.

But on the other hand, you are not bound by the terms of the Work Contract to send socks to us at all, unless you wish. You may dispose of them to private trade—just as Mrs. Clark does, but the company is bound to accept and pay for all the standard socks you do send them—whether the amount be large or small.

A Wonderful Work Record Less Than 5% Rejections

The Auto Knitter is for workers—for those who are serious in their desire to make money in their spare hours. The Olde Tyme Wool Socks that are sent to us under the Work Contract come from everywhere—from novices as well as the experienced—and yet, out of the huge total sent in to us less than 5% have to be laid aside and returned to the worker as not being up to the standard set for Olde Tyme All-Wool Socks.

We believe it to be a great tribute to the general all-round efficiency of the Auto Knitter and the Auto Knitter Workers, that the rejections on this home work, performed in many, many different homes, are so small as to be almost negligible. If these folks learned from the instruction book to make socks that average less than 5% rejections, can you not do so, too?

The Auto Knitter will answer every demand made upon it for speed and reliability, and your earnings will be in proportion to the time you devote and the degree of proficiency attained through practice.

Find Out How You May Receive "Money Orders from Toronto"

If you are seeking some way to turn spare moments into money then we would like to send you all the facts about the Auto Knitter. We want you to know all about this new, pleasant occupation that can be conducted in your own home as a means of earning dollars in spare hours. You do not place yourself under the slightest obligation by signing and mailing the coupon—or write a letter if you prefer. The full details which we send to you are absolutely free.

THERE'S a mysterious air which comes over every well-regulated household about the first week of December and which lasts until the New Year is in sight:—There are cynics and would-be cynics who belittle the Christmas Spirit and try to make it other than the joyous thing it is:—something which makes the very word, "Christmas," stand out in golden letters in the memories of our childhood. Think of a world without Santa Claus! What a dreary old Earth it would be, without the music of those sleigh-bells, as the reindeer comes fast through the wintry air! They are the bringers of a message of good cheer and we hope that Santa Claus will never become so up-to-date as to have his whiskers trimmed and discard his sleigh for an aeroplane. The latter is all very well, in its way, but Christmas demands old observances, and so we simply insist on the sleigh and the bells and the stockings in the chimney corner:—even if a bed post has to do duty for the old-time fireplace. There are no traffic policemen awaiting the coming of Santa Claus, with the intention of arresting the worthy old saint. He has the right-of-way across the sky on the night of December twenty-fourth and may his joy-ride this year be one of the best he has known!

Don't you like the smells of Christmas-time? There is the rich suggestion of mince meat in the air, and you know that raisins and spices are making material for the most delicious cakes and pies. There are oranges and stuffed dates abroad and you more than suspect that there will be candies of the most melting variety in be-ribboned baskets and boxes. But, of course, we would not ask about these things:—no, not for the world.

PERHAPS you are tired of advice about Christmas presents. So, let us have a "talk" concerning them instead. There was once a friend who sent to each of her small circle something which eminently expressed herself. She consulted the tastes and the preferences of the recipients, but there was always in the gift that which was distinctive:—whether it was merely a touch of ribbon or a spray of pressed flowers. She had not many friends, that graceful giver, for she liked the quiet places of life and few knew her well; but to those who were her friends there was an especial charm about her Christmas remembrances, for each spoke of the sender and of her thought of the one on whom she bestowed book or picture or a filmy kerchief. She did not forget your preferences in color or subject and never sent a pink sachet to someone who revelled in lavender. She had her own dainty preference for tying her parcels with twisted cords of pale-blue and white, regardless of the traditional green and holly red of Christmas time, and you could always tell her gifts when the postman left the box or parcel with the familiar wrapping, even though the handwriting had been disguised. She has gone to the land that is very far off and—"there's a spray of cypress twining with the holly wreath to-night." As the Decembers come and go, there will always be missed that gentle message of the friendship that understands.

A MERCHANT was writing articles on certain sales recently, for a weekly journal, when he made the cheering statement that he finds the vast majority of customers strictly honest. Thousands are in his shop during the day and yet he very seldom finds anything like evasion of payment—which is by system of check, paid to the cashier. When we read the front page of the papers we are tempted to think that this is a quarrelsome wretched world, where the chief business of man is to hurt and destroy his brother man. Just let us remind ourselves that the front page chronicles the startling happenings, not the normal day's work. Drunkards, drug fiends and divorces are still very much in the minority, even in California. Do not let us make any mistake about the Average Man and his Wife, to say nothing about the ever-so-wonderful children. Most of us are sincerely trying to do as well as we "know"—and, when we fail, the personal mortification is greater than any blame which the neighbors can express.

That stimulating writer, Mr. Gilbert Keith Chesterton, who usually has common-sense back of his uncommon sayings, tells us that "news is sin, and sin is news." He proceeds to illustrate in this fashion. There may be—say a dozen—families residing in a certain street. Eleven of them may pass the night of May the first in orderly and refreshing slumber. One family may be disturbed by the husband and father becoming violently drunk and creating such an unseemly turmoil that the disorderly citizen is taken away in the patrol wagon and Number Forty-Eleven, Rose Terrace, is mentioned in the morning paper as a scene of untimely riot. Then the dwellers on Hyacinth Hill will exclaim: "Oh, what a terrible neighborhood! It must be a very undesirable community"—forgetting all about the eleven sober and righteous households which "laid them down in peace and slept."

There is much that is depressing in this after-the-war world:—especially, if we are going to take the word of the news-monger for the condition of civilization. Nevertheless the most cheering matters for contemplation are the everyday happenings in the lives of Most of Us. It's a kindly old world, in spite of the execrable Kaiser and the unspeakable Kemal. So Tiny Tim has reason for saying the old blessing.

him to Italy," he said. "And 'twill be a cure!" With four thousand pounds in the bank—"

She stopped so suddenly that Pamela cast an arm about her, fearing she might fall; but she clasped a rigid strength. Mr. Sheridan raised his quizzing glass to stare at the actress's countenance; into her pale cheeks a fierce colour had risen. She was amazingly beautiful.

"And so, my dear Miss Falcon—my dear Mrs. Morgan," he cried curiously, "you took the favourable moment of confessing your subterfuge, your heroic subterfuge, to your pious husband! How did he bear it? A Welshman and a chapel man! I trust it was not a shock."

Her eyes turned upon him as if she were bereft of the power of understanding.

"Mr. Sheridan means, ma'am," cried the equerry impatiently, "how did the good preacher bear the awful revelation? Did you not yourself say that at four o'clock—four, wasn't it, Sherry?—the great Falcon mystery ceased to exist?"

"You are right, sir," said Fair Fatality. "When I returned from rehearsal this afternoon I found—I saw—I knew—there was no secret between us any more! You want to know so much about me, all of you." Her voice rose suddenly and piercingly. "Your curiosity shall be gratified to the end."

She moved away from Pamela with a steady step, flung open the folding doors, and pointed into the room revealed with a single magnificent gesture.

Grasping the elbows of his chair, fuddled, inquisitive, the Prince of Wales lifted himself to stare. Mr. Sheridan took two strides and brought himself up with an ejaculation. And "Damn me!" cried the equerry, in accents of anger and fear. "This is a dashed low trick!"

There was no need for anyone to cast a second glance into that room. The lights and flowers, the rigid figure on the bed, covered with a white sheet, told their own story. The genial party were looking upon death.

"Oh, you poor creature! You poor, unhappy dear!" cried Pamela Pounce, bursting into hot tears, and catching the Falcon to her heart.

The preacher's wife abandoned herself to the embrace; but only for the span of a moment, not for the relief of tears, not for the comfort of another woman's tenderness, but because, just for that little while, every power fell into suspense. When she disengaged herself they were alone with the dead. Royalty and its boon companions had seized the opportunity to retire from a scene so discomforting.

Felicity turned an abstracted gaze into the dining-room; it was clear to Pamela that her visitors, Royalty and all, were of less consequence in her mind than the stray moth that fluttered round the candles.

"Will you look at him?" said the widow.

Pamela wished that she would cry or swoon. This composure was terrible. Sobbing herself, she was drawn to the bedside, and, as Felicity lifted the sheet, gazed down upon the quiet, beautiful face. The play-actress bent and kissed the young forehead set in such majestic peace, and replaced the coverlet, rearranging the white roses after she had done so. Then once more she took her companion by the arm, led her back into the dining-room, and closed the folding doors.

"Now you must drink a glass of wine with me," she said, "before you go."

"But I will stay with you."

"No. No. The coach is waiting for you. The driver will take you safe back. I prefer to be alone."

She went to a cupboard and drew out a decanter and a couple of glasses, and while Pamela sat and mopped her eyes with a drenched handkerchief, and bit her lip to keep down the rising sob, and chid herself for a poor, vaporous wretch no use to anyone, the woman who had lost her all poured out the wine with a steady hand; and with a steady hand did something else besides.

She brought the glasses to the table, gave one to Pamela, and stood watching her while she drank.

Then she sat down beside her, and still holding her own full glass between taper fingers, leant across and said:

"Kiss me, my dear, and thank you. When I went back to him after the rehearsal to-day, so full of joy, the woman said he was asleep, and I bent to kiss him, and, oh, his lips were cold! His lips were cold! Yours are warm. I wish I'd known you before. We should have been friends. Nay, 'tis as well! I might have brought misfortune to you as to the others. 'Tis better as it is," she repeated rather wildly.

And when sobbing that her own story was told and that she knew too what a broken heart meant, Pamela would have kissed her again, Felicity pushed her from her, and drank quickly.

In the silence that followed, Pamela drew herself physically and mentally together, twisted her handkerchief, patted her curls, wiped her eyes a last time, then, in the tone of one firmly determined on the right course of action:

"The coach may go, I'll not leave you!" she cried.

She broke off. Was it the scent of the flowers from the death-chamber, or some curious flavour in the wine? She was all at once aware of a singular, intense smell of almonds in the air.

"Miss Falcon, Mrs. Morgan, my dear! Oh, you're faint, you're ill, and no wonder!"

She clutched the sinking figure, but Fair Fatality had acted her last tragedy.

Pamela Pounce never wore the Medusa ring. She dared not; but she kept it all her life.

CHAPTER XI

IN WHICH THERE IS A PRODIGIOUS SCANDAL ABOUT PINK FLOUNCES

NONE ever knew the share which Pamela had taken in Felicity Falcon's last night on earth.

She had laid the slender figure as decently and respectfully as she could, on a couch, kissed the cold cheek once more, and walked out of the house.

Those who would find her in the morning must make what they could of the story. Pamela had her own life and those dependent on her to consider. She could not afford to be mixed up with a scandal.

Whether the chapel people to whose ranks the young preacher had belonged were desirous of hushing up the evidence which might bring discredit upon them, or whether it were really believed that Mrs. Morgan had died of a heart-stroke brought on by grief did not transpire. They were buried together and given a very pious funeral with much preaching and psalm-singing.

The event made a profound impression upon Pamela; it revived the cruel emotions of her recent personal experience.

She had seen what love meant as never before; she understood its fearful supremacy, and how little anything else mattered beside it in life. There were times when she even envied Felicity Falcon; true, she had loved to desperation and death, but she had loved and been loved with a noble purity and faithfulness!

The memory of the young Welsh preacher's dead face, radiantly innocent, and of the triumph, set in agony, of the actress's countenance as she had last seen it, haunted her continually. Death had stamped on their mortal love the seal of eternity.

* * *

Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs had lain in wait, the whole warm June sunset hour, till Miss Pounce should emerge from the side-door of the shut-up shop; he followed the erect, briskly walking figure with due discretion, and only permitted himself to catch her up at the corner of Berkeley Square. Then he accosted her.

"Don't, I do beseech you," he cried, quickly forestalling the fierce repudiation in her eye, "don't refuse to listen! I have not come after you to insult you, I haven't, upon my honour! Pamela, I want to apologise. I want to ask your pardon."

His tone was so imploring and respectful, he looked so eager, so gallant and handsome too, in the rosy amber light, as he bent towards her, bare-headed, that her weapon of pride seemed broken in her hand.

She tried to say with dignity: "There's nothing more that I ever wish to hear from you, Mr. Bellairs," but her voice faltered, and a sudden tear in each eye betrayed her.

"See," he went on eagerly. "The gate of the garden there is open. Let us go in, and sit on that bench. Just for a little while! Five minutes! One minute!"

Pamela, shaking her head, and exclaiming: "No, sir. Nay, Mr. Bellairs, I cannot listen, 'tis impossible! 'Tis wrong! 'Tis folly!" nevertheless allowed herself to be drawn into the cool green tree-shadowed spot, and actually sat down on the suggested seat.

He did not as much as offer her his hand; yet his urgency drove her almost with a physical force.

"Oh, Pamela," he cried, letting himself fall beside her, and clasping his hands and wringing them, "can you conceive what I felt when I heard that 'twas you—oh, my generous girl—who paid my debt? And to think how the first use I made of my liberty was to offend you so grossly."

Pamela swallowed a sob. "Tis over and done with now, Mr. Bellairs. Let me forget."

She tried to rise, but he caught a fold of her dress.

"One moment more, if you have a woman's heart. Nay, you see how anxious I am not to presume. I will go on my knees if you like. Oh, Pamela, when I went to pay back my Lord his ninety-seven pound ten, out of that pocketful of money you know of, and he stared at me, and: 'Why, man,' says he, 'I never thought to see you this morning! Her Ladyship was in one of her bad ways, and sure, if it was I had been in the sponging house, she'd not have out with a farthing! I've been but waiting for a better moment,' says he. 'Then who, in the name o' God?' cries I, cutting him short. Pamela, I lost no time in making my conge to my Lord, and I ran all the way to that fellow Jobbins—I promise you! For I'll get to the bottom of this,' I cried. 'And 'twas a lady veiled,' quoth he, and stuck to it, and the fool that I am, must needs think my cousin Kitty was playing a sort of game with me; ashamed not to pay for me, but, the stingy thing! mortal afraid lest I should ask her again! And I went back again to Hertford Street to make a further exhibition of myself."

Here Pamela could not keep from laughter.

"You laugh! 'Tis all I deserve. Indeed, 'twas a monstrous absurd scene. But my Lady pretty soon convinced me that the magnanimity I ascribed to her was unknown to that bit of strass she calls her heart. By the Lord, I think I was mad that morning altogether! I hardly know how I got out of Hertford Street once more, and all the way down to Jobbins, for the thought had dawned! I've not so many friends, you see, Pamela! 'A tall, fine figure of a lady,' says he, 'stepping as clean as your own sorrel filly, Mr. Jocelyn. And I caught, says he, 'a gleam of hair under the veil—now, if you'll run your eye down the row in there says he, jerking his thumb towards his stables, 'you'll see, third from the door, a bit of a gloss on a hack's back that's just the same colour.' And so I knew," added Jocelyn, with a sudden drop from his tone of mimicry, into accents of real emotion.

Pamela set her teeth upon her trembling lip. She made a desperate effort after her usual fine air of independence.

"'Twas when we were friends, I'll have you remember, Mr. Bellairs," she said, with a toss of her head.

"Ah, but Pamela, let us be friends now," he spoke with a boyish earnestness which made him infinitely more attractive than in his most dashing mood of sparkishness.

"'Tis just for that I have sought you. I want your forgiveness. I want your friendship. Let me see you sometimes, as a friend, a most respectful friend, honoured by your acquaintance. I am a wretched, worthless fellow," he went on, with a kind of bitter humility. "I can't even pay you back your loan, now, Pamela. But grant me a chance. Let me show myself better than you have known me. 'Pon honour, it would give me something to hope for, just to think you'd let me see you now and again, in a kindly way; that you had not cast me altogether out of your life."

It was the acknowledgment that he couldn't pay her back that softened Miss Pounce's obduracy towards him. She consented to forgive him, to consider him as a friend, even to admit the possibility that if they met—oh, quite accidentally!—on an off-day, she mightn't refuse to take a stroll with him in the Green Park.

It would seem as if nothing had changed; as if she was the same too-trusting, foolish girl, and he the same sly, audacious, villain; yet, as she determinedly parted from him and hurried out of the garden to her lodging, she knew that there had come a profound alteration into their relations.

Meanwhile the enmity excited in the bosoms of Miss Smithson and Miss Popple against the successful milliner was far from abating. Indeed, the mature young lady who had hoped for Pamela Pounce's present position had an ever-gathering sense of grievance. What if she had a heavy hand? Were there not solid dowagers and others who preferred substance and money's worth to your fly-away gossamer nothings?

Between these two important members of Madame Mirabel's establishment, there had come to be a tacit understanding—though they were far too genteel and high-minded to indulge in anything like a conspiracy—that it was their bounden duty, in dear Madame Mirabel's interests, to keep a sharp look-out on Miss Pounce, and report any proceedings of hers calculated to injure them.

"As, of course, my dear, poor Anna-Maria," Clara Smithson would declare of her rich business relative, "is that good-natured that times and times I've had to step in, as it were, and save her from herself."

Miss Popple was too tactful to request specification.

"La, you never say, dear!" she would exclaim, with unflinching emphasis. "And what a good thing it is that she's got you, the poor kind creature! 'Tis what we all feel."

The while her private thoughts would run contemptuously:

"As if every one didn't know, you long-toothed old frump, that 'tis you Madame keeps on out of charity, and has the books regular checked by a spry young gentleman from the bank every Saturday night, private, or they'd be in the middle of the world before the month was out!"

Miss Clara Smithson's secret opinion of Miss Popple was probably no more complimentary, but it is in the nature of things that worthy individuals, working for a common cause, should sink personal feelings; and, therefore, when Miss Smithson made the appalling discovery in connection with the pink-flounced muslin of a Sunday afternoon, it was Miss Popple to whom she confided it the first thing on Monday morning.

That Sunday afternoon being a remarkably fine day, Miss Smithson had accepted the offer of the married nephew in the Tobacco Trade, who was particularly civil to her in view of her reported savings, to drive with him in a hackney as far as Richmond Park, and partake of a choice refection of ale and winkles by the river-side. Now, as the hackney was rolling along the highway towards Richmond, they passed a cottage on the outskirts of the town, a quite superior cottage residence with an embowered garden, honeysuckle and roses. In this

Christmas Cakes and Puddings

BY FRANCIS M. McNALLY

IF there be one time, above all others when the cook is a person of supreme importance it is just before Christmas. In the light of modern science, the custom of observing the day by overfeeding ourselves and everyone else within reach, may appear to be nothing less than indulgence in dietetic sins but man seems to be endowed with extraordinary capacity and almost superhuman power of digestion at this festive season of the year and it would surely be a great Christmas dinner, we are not very hungry and a little goes a long way.

The true spirit of Christmas can be gained only if one personally directs the making of the cakes and puddings. Few gifts bring more joy to the heart of the business man or woman, away from home than a dainty box or a gay basket filled with home made sweets. The homemaker who envelopes herself in a big apron and mixes and bakes to her heart's content will feel more of the real mistake not to keep up the traditions of plum pudding and Christmas cake, and the spirit of hospitality of our ancestors in merrie England. Modern habits of life, however, make it desirable to serve very small portions of these rich foods, to be eaten in the spirit of celebration of the day and with some consideration of one's digestion. Every English family, of any social standing seems to have possessed an individual recipe for the famous English plum pudding. In many families these recipes have been handed down from generation to generation as cherished heirlooms, to be used only at this time of year. It is therefore not surprising that we Canadians with English ancestors feel that whatever else is omitted from the Christmas table the plum pudding is a "must have." Luckily for us when we reach the pudding stage of the Christmas spirit and find more joy in giving, than if she spent twice as many hours haunting the shops. If you are searching for something novel and acceptable to give to your most dearly beloved friends try this recipe for plum pudding. Steam small portions in bowls or fancy moulds and wrap in holiday style.

Plum Pudding:—One pound, stoned raisins, one pound currants, one pound suet, chopped fine, one pound stale bread crumbs, one pound brown sugar one-half teaspoon ground ginger, one-half teaspoon mixed spice, one-half nutmeg grated, one-half teaspoon salt, eight eggs, two ounces lemon peel two ounces orange peel, two ounces citron peel, two cups milk. Mix all the dry ingredients together. Beat the eggs and mix into the dry mixture; if not soft enough use one or stir in our town. I did not move from the barrel when I saw a slim little girl in a trim suit step off the rear car. She looked about her, not as if for any one, but at the mountains. That was the first surprise, I thought she'd be scared and nervous. Not she, and by the time she had spotted me I felt queer myself. It was as quick as that. She touched something that had been asleep in me the first time she looked and spoke. Sometimes things do happen like that. It was not long before she had me learning. We spent our evenings together and I worked hard, I wanted to know a lot, I can tell you."

The boy drew a book from the shelf by the window. Well worn, finger marked, loving marks of keen interest. It was, "The Three Musketeers," by Dumas. On the first page was written:

"To John Morgan
from Alice Harvey."

"She gave you this?" Rob asked.
"Yes, most of them on those shelves," John answered.

"Gad!" burst from the boy. "Gad!"
"She taught me all I know, I owe her my mind. Before she came it was a blank—not a damn thing in it."

"Well, go on," the boy said, and sat down by the fire.

"I was four years younger than she was. She always thought of me as a boy, called me Jack. That's in some of the books, just, 'To Jack'. She'd mark them in places too, before I got them. They are all marked now, the same."

Rob leaned over and dug the poker into the fire.

John continued: "She made a man out of a stupid clown, that's what she did."

"The stuff was there you bet," Rob broke in.

John smiled, a rare thing, then a shadow passed over his face. Far off a train whistled. The valleys caught it, and sent it along to the mountains where it seemed to climb and echo, and echo and climb, until it faded away, leaving an empty silence within the room.

"It was with that she came and with that she went away, one Christmas Eve—" John Morgan's voice was low—"I never hear them I don't see her waving good-bye." He stopped speaking, got up and went to his pipe rack, where he had a variety to choose from. An old tried favorite was taken.

"Yes, those whistles always make me think of her, and life, a life I've never known, except through those," his eyes rested on the books, "She used to say the trains meant Romance to me, coming from a world I did not know, and going on into mystery.—I felt so sure I could never get along without her, I never thought how it looked to her. It came, a knock-out blow, she was going away, going away to be married. It was not her fault, I was just a boy she had helped. Eighteen then, and she was past twenty. I had had my two years."

"But—" the boy spoke slowly, "her influence lasted."

"She made me what I am."

"And you're great," with enthusiasm. Again that smile, which after fading only left his face more touched with sorrow.

"She married one of those travelling fellows. He had a big run, sometimes went to the old country. She always wanted to see England and if she could get to Paris, well she'd have been happy. They were to take trips together, she told me, but I guess they never did. She always sent me books at Christmas, post marked, Montreal, addressed in her hand writing. I guess she never travelled much."

The boy nodded but said nothing.
"She used to put, 'To John Morgan, from A. P.' after she was married. I have quite a few like that. Then one Christmas they stopped. But just before that something happened; I got a letter from her. The trains began to whistle and very much better—are made by using part Roman Meal and part flour in puddings and cakes.

Recipe

Plum Pudding

Mix 1 Cup Roman Meal; ½ cup flour; 2 T. Spn Cinnamon; 1 T. Spn ground ginger; ¼ T. Spn ground cloves; ¼ T. Spn ground alspice; 1½ cups seeded raisins; 1½ cups currants; 2 cups suet; ¾ cup chopped peel; ½ cup blanched almonds; ½ T. Spn salt. Mix well 3 eggs and ½ cup brown sugar. Stir in 1 cup milk. Stir both mixtures together. Mix well. Place in Mould. Boil or steam 2½ hours. Serve with carmel or hard sauce.

Finer flavor—richer color—more granular—more digestible—less soggy—and in every way superior products result from mixing ROMAN MEAL with flour. Make your Christmas treat a greater treat with Roman Meal—Nature's Nut Brown Food.

Recipe

Caramel Sauce

2 cups granulated sugar; 2 cups water; butter size of walnut; 2 tablespoons cornstarch—dissolved in cold water; 1 teaspoonful vanilla; ½ cup of the sugar to be browned. When golden brown add butter. Bring to boil, add starch and vanilla.

Recipe

Christmas Cake

Mix 1¼ Cup Roman Meal; 1 cup flour; 2¼ cups currants; 1½ cups Sultana Raisins; 1 cup chopped lemon peel; ¼ cup blanched almonds; ¼ T. Spn ground cloves; ½ T. Spn ground cinnamon; ¼ T. Spn ground ginger; ¼ T. Spn alspice; pinch nutmeg. Cream well 5 eggs, 1 cup Brown sugar; add 1 cup butter; ¼ cup molasses. Stir both mixtures together, beat well. Bake in well greased tin 2½ to 3 hours, moderate oven.

Add ROMAN MEAL
to Your Daily Diet.

ROMAN MEAL is the only balanced combination of whole grains—wheat, rye, Flaxin, and comminuted bran. It is a delicious family food, to be used as porridge, or baked into anything half and half with flour. By using Roman Meal in some way every day, with plenty of milk and some leafy vegetables (preferably uncooked) you provide your body—and the bodies of your children—with every element necessary to sturdy health and long life, and correct the "deficiencies" of modern "excess acid" and "deficiency" foods. Roman Meal aids digestion, positively relieves constipation.

With one exception the most economical cereal sold.

A warning -bleeding gums

ARE your gums tender? Do they bleed when brushed? If so—watch out for Pyorrhea.

This disease of the gums, which afflicts four out of five people over forty, not only destroys the teeth, but often wrecks the health.

In Pyorrhea the gums become spongy, then recede; the teeth decay, loosen and fall out—or must be extracted to rid the system of the infecting Pyorrhea germs which breed in pockets about them. These germs lower the body's vitality and cause many diseases.

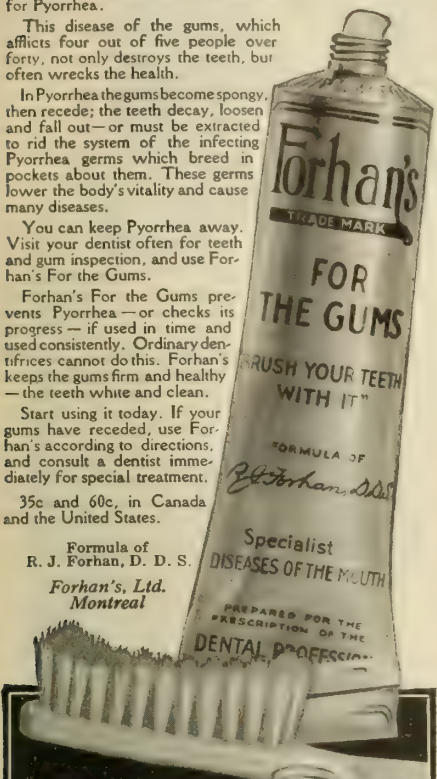

You can keep Pyorrhea away. Visit your dentist often for teeth and gum inspection, and use Forhan's For the Gums.

Forhan's For the Gums prevents Pyorrhea—or checks its progress—if used in time and used consistently. Ordinary dentifrices cannot do this. Forhan's keeps the gums firm and healthy—the teeth white and clean.

Start using it today. If your gums have receded, use Forhan's according to directions, and consult a dentist immediately for special treatment.

Pamela Pounce

was Miss Pounce now holding in her hand when, rather out of breath—for she was of a stout habit and a congested type of comeliness—Polly Popple came heavily up to her.

"And pray, Miss Pounce," said the assistant, while, at the abruptness of the address, unprecedented by the usual "Good morning," all the young ladies turned to stare—pray, Miss Pounce, was you by any chance Richmond way yesterday?"

Polly was no diplomatist.

"And what's that to you, Miss Popple?" responded Pamela. "As a matter of fact, I was; but 'tain't none of your business, as I'm aware! Girls, what are you doing?"

Pamela scented mischief, and resented the tone of the question, which rang in unmistakable challenge. Nevertheless, she remained good-humoured.

"Perhaps," said the other darkly, "'tis more my business than you think of. Might I further inquire if you was wearing a pink gown, miss?"

"Yes, Popple, I was. A pink gown, flounced to the waist, muslin. A sweet thing it is, and suits me uncommon. Perhaps you'd like to know if I wear a white bouffant to it, and the style of hat?"

"Oh, never mind the hat, Miss Pounce! Since you are so obligeing as to permit me another question, might I ask if you was a-setting in a garden a-holding of a child upon your lap?"

The colour flew like a flag to the head milliner's cheek and fire to her eye. Then she abruptly turned her back upon the questioner, and the youngest assistant, who happened to be taking a hat out of the drawer, was surprised to see that she was struggling with a violent inclination to laugh.

"Ho!"

The ejaculation leaped with a world of horror from Polly's lips.

Her superior wheeled back upon her.

"Yes, Miss Popple, I was sitting in a garden, and very pleasant it was among the roses; and I had a child upon my lap, the dearest, sweetest little creature that ever breathed, a perfect cherub! A girl, if you want to know, Miss Popple, and though dark, like to be a beauty."

The young ladies tittered, though there were looks interchanged, too. And Pamela's tone, tripped up with subterranean mirth, sounded to some of them rather hysterical.

Polly, after a dumb show of wounded female delicacy, expressively rendered, tottered from the room as if her legs could scarce carry so much horrified rectitude; and the incident apparently dropped.

Indeed, Pamela regarded it merely as another of Popple's nasty bits of spleen. A low-minded, common creature! As if her girls would be taken in by such vile suggestions! As if the life of Pamela Pounce, head milliner, was not as fresh and fair as her own face!

An episode which Pamela could not but consider as curious in the circumstances presently occurred and drove the very existence of Popple from her mind.

A carriage drew up to the door, early as it was—ten o'clock had not yet struck—and a customer entered, a short dark young woman of a marked type of Spanish beauty, who walked with a bold cadence of the hips that set her maize silk panniers swinging, and a carriage of the head that you might call like that of a fawn or of a serpent, as your feelings towards her prompted.

Pamela advanced in her most engaging manner.

"What can I do for you, madam?" She broke off. "Merciful heavens!" something within her cried. "I should know that face."

The newcomer fixed her with beautiful, insolent eyes. There was a gleam of rubies in each delicate ear, and at the dusky round throat a red fire that came and went from a monstrous clasp of the same stones, half-hidden by laces.

"If you will show me a hat, all black, with black feathers," began the lady. She had a slow voice, rich like cream, and an odd guttural aspiration of the consonants. "Something with the Spanish air."

In her turn, she stopped short. The milliner had fallen back a pace, and was looking at her with horror.

"I think," said Pamela, very low but very distinctly, "that you have entered this establishment by mistake."

The foreign lady wheeled upon her. There was no doubt about it, with all her beauty she was viperish.

"Fool, my name is the Countess Sanquhar!"

"And a very fit name for you, too!" responded Pamela.

Upon which extraordinary observation she herself opened the door and stood until the visitor passed out.

You may be a beauty, and you may be the lawful wife of an English peer, but it is difficult to keep your dignity when you are turned out of a shop by a miserable working woman as if you were the last of the last. Only by doing murder on her offender could the notorious Lady Sanquhar, who had been once the respected wife of an honest Spanish merchant, have redeemed the situation from utter ignominy. But as she could not do murder in actual fact, she only did it with her eyes, as, swaying more than ever, she went forth.

Pamela shut the door; the four assistants stared at her with one accord. They had not known such an exciting morning for a long time.

"Upon my word, Miss Pounce," said Polly Popple, "you take a deal upon yourself, you do."

Pamela sat down, rather white about the lips, breathing quickly through dilated nostrils.

"If it had got known that I'd sold as much as a feather to that creature," she said, "Madame Mirabel might as well put up her shutters, for there's not a lady of quality would have crossed the threshold of her showroom again."

CHAPTER XII

IN WHICH MY LADY KILCRONEY INSISTS ON THE DUTY OF MORALITY

"If you please, my Lady, might I speak to your Ladyship?"

My Lady Kilcroney looked up from the sorrows of Miss Clarissa Harlowe, which she was particularly enjoying, and gazed at her handmaiden.

Lydia Pounce and her mistress had gone through, together, so many emotions, intrigues, quarrels, reconciliations, triumphs, and despairs that it was scarcely too much to say they had become indispensable to each other. Therefore, too, both had grown to read each other's countenances with the utmost facility. Now, Lydia was pale and pinched; her knobby little hands were clasping each other fiercely across her neat waistband; she was visibly trembling. Lady Kilcroney knew these symptoms.

"What is to do, Lydia?"

"Ho, my Lady!"

The Abigail here clutched at her heart and turned up her eyes.

"Dear me, Lydia," said her Ladyship, tartly, "have they ventured to laugh again in the pantry as you happened to be passing, or has anyone broken into the safe and stolen my diamonds?"

"Ho, your Ladyship, you may well ask. Heaven knows I'm prepared from this out to be the laughing-stock of this house. Every one may point the finger of scorn at me. The name of Pounce is for ever blasted! As for thieves, my Lady, there are worse thieves than will ever be hanged walking about this moment, and treasures stolen of value far above diamonds!"

"Dear me!"

"Her Ladyship wouldn't be so easy with her 'dear me's' if she knew what's happened. 'Tis gospel truth, my Lady, and I'm telling no falsehood, that the thought of having to inform your Ladyship is the bitterest part of the sorrow that has come upon me this day!"

What Are the Happiest Moments of Christmas?

CHRISTMAS cheer! The gifts, the tree, the Dinner and the Candies. How we all strive for a touch of originality that will make the event more memorable for children as well as grown-ups.

The Dinner DESSERT and the CANDY naturally go together, and so I have given much thought to the creation of something new, delightful, and wholesome for these—the happiest moments of the year.

First a plum pudding that is really wonderful and so easy to make.

Chocolate Plum Pudding

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1/4 cup sliced citron or nuts as preferred	1/2 cup currants
1/4 cup cold water	1/2 cup chocolate
1 cup sugar	1 1/2 squares chocolate
1/2 teaspoonful vanilla	1 pint milk
1 cup seeded raisins	Pinch salt
1/2 cup dates or figs, if desired

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes. Put milk in double boiler, add melted chocolate, and when scalding point is reached add sugar, salt and soaked gelatine. Remove from fire and when mixture begins to thicken add vanilla, fruit and nut meats. Turn into large mold or fancy or plain individual molds, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Remove to serving dish and garnish with holly. Serve with whipped cream, or whipped evaporated milk, sweetened, and flavored with vanilla.

Next, something really delicious in CANDY that has the added charm of being homemade and so wholesome that the children may eat their fill without a "don't." Put it in dainty boxes for Christmas gifts.

Mother's Christmas Dainties

1 cup cold water	1 1/2 cups boiling water
2 envelopes Knox Sparkling Gelatine
1 cups granulated sugar

Soak gelatine in the cold water ten minutes. Add the boiling water. When dissolved add sugar and boil slowly for 15 minutes. Divide into two equal parts. When somewhat cooled add to one part 2 tablespoons lemon juice and one teaspoon lemon extract and coloring if desired. To the other part add one teaspoon extract of cinnamon and coloring. Pour into bread tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night. When ready to turn out dip knife in cold water and run around edge of pan. Pull out with fingers and cut in squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavors—orange, peppermint, etc.—and colors, adding chopped nuts, dates, etc.

Other Christmas Surprises—Free

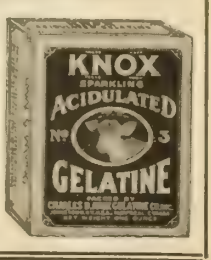

My books, "Dainty Desserts" and "Food Economy," are full of original recipes for Christmas and every other day in the year. Mailed free if you send 4c. to cover postage, and your grocer's name.

The Echo

a lively tune again. She wrote to ask if she could get a room in this town. She had not been well, and the doctor wanted her to come to the mountains. These were the mountains for her, she said, and this was the air. A month passed, she didn't come. I never heard again.

THE log was burning down to glowing coals, sometimes a piece fell sending up dancing sparks, and adding for a moment, more warmth to the bed of light. Without, the night was absolutely still, brilliant stars shone in the keen frosty air. The topmost peaks of the mountains seemed to reach up as if trying to gather them to their dark and gloomy depths.

Rob was the first to break the silence that had followed John's last word.

"I'll tell my part now," he said.

John waited, blowing rings of smoke to the low ceiling, watching them grow bigger and bigger, then break and disappear.

"I told you my name was Robert Pearce, that's not true, it is Robert Price," the boy expected intense surprise, but John sat big and massive, sending rings of smoke to the ceiling.

"I had reasons," Rob continued. "I wanted to know you without any past attached to me. Alice Harvey was my mother. Now you know, it may make some difference."

"I could not like you more than I do Rob, and that would not make me like you any less," John's great love for Alice's son looked out from his deep-set grey eyes.

"I'm glad, say, that makes me feel better," Rob's voice was relieved, but he still spoke with difficulty. "My mother never gave up hope that she would get to these mountains, but she got too weak to travel. She died about two months after she wrote. She used to talk a lot about you, I feel I've known you all my life."

The man's big hand came down gently on Rob's shoulder, but he did not speak.

"She always wanted me to know you. She said: 'He is a big man, Rob.'—I couldn't help but miss her these past four years, I've just got along. My father married again two years ago. There's a kid now, sort of a nice kid too—" Rob smiled. "Well my mother never wanted me to be a traveller. She always said: 'You're so dreamy Rob, all the other travellers would get there first before you wakened up.' You know how she laughed; her eyes would wrinkle up, shut up tight. Gee," said the boy, "it—"

"I know Rob, I know. Well you are not going to be a traveller are you?"

"No sir!" Rob answered briskly. "I want to write. She wanted me to. When I could I was to come to you, and learn a bit of roughing it, so I came. Had pretty easy roughing for a month. It's been great, absolutely."

"You are a dreamer Rob. It was taking a big chance your coming to find me in this town. A miner is usually a mover, but I stuck, I felt I belonged here, and I've made good, got advancement, hold a position that would keep me, even if other things did not. Yes, you took a big chance. However you found me. Now I've been making some plans."

John lay down his pipe. "Plans I hope you fall in with. Rough it for the rest of this winter, it will do you good. Those stooping shoulders, too much writing Rob. Just forget it for a few months. Then in the fall you can go back to Montreal to study and when ready enter McGill. You've got to have some education, and a good deal of experience to write."

"McGill! I say—" the boy's face flushed.

"Let me finish, I have saved up quite enough for two. Living in a mining town as I've done," he glanced at the books, "does not use up much money. I've told you how I feel about your mother, so that you would understand, there is no obligation, none. What I have is sachets which made a highly welcome present. If you are making these small gifts yourself, be sure to use a sachet powder which is really strong, as a poor sachet powder loses its fragrance very quickly. By "strong," I do not mean a penetrating perfume, but one which is lasting. There are many delightful sachet powders on the market and a small sachet pinned inside the coat will diffuse a pleasing fragrance for many weeks—

An evening chef-d'oeuvre

just a hint of lavender or violet. The sachet also finds a place in the glove box, the handkerchief case or among the veils.

Some of us will be fortunate enough to be presented with the complete set for the dressing table—and grant that it be just what we like in ivory or silver or amber. There are beautiful little travelling cases, too, filled with all the dainty toilet appointments which the heart of woman could desire.

Just let me warn you here that if you are thinking of a present for a man in terms of the dressing table, be sure to get the brushes or the comb of a substantial nature. Man demands that the gift be more than something nice to look at.

So, let us hope that when Santa Claus comes down the chimney, he casts a friendly eye upon the dressing table and drops a welcome gift upon its shining surface.

THE LETTER BOX

FROM THE WEST. You are very welcome this afternoon, for we are having our first flurry of snow and I am wondering what it would be like to be out in the west, with the north wind blowing. Of course, your complexion can cope with the "inclemency of the weather," if you make up your mind to fight the elements with such means as the cream jar and the almond lotion have placed at your disposal. There is no use in being discouraged and bidding a fond farewell to a soft skin and shining hair, just because the stormy winds do blow. At night you should give the skin a regular treatment, washing first with soap and tepid water, afterwards taking a cold ablution and finally having an application of softening cream which will help to keep the skin in satisfactory condition. I have sent you the names as you desired.

ESTELLE.—That is a nice starry name to send in to the Vanity Box. So you wish to know if there is anything harmless with which you may brighten your eyes. With such a name, you should not be in any great need of learning about eye-brighteners. Do not dally with belladonna or any such means of temporarily improving the appearance of the eyes. The result is likely to be disastrous—and an accident or injury to the optic nerve is just about as bad a handicap as the human system can endure. The best course to take, in order to secure bright eyes, is to have the body in fit condition by means of the proper diet and exercise, and give the eyes a bath every day with a solution of boracic acid. If you desire to increase the length of the eyelashes, the best treatment is to touch them every night with vaseline, not allowing the vaseline to get into the eyes, as it might produce an unpleasant

A Frock for the Debutante - Surely no more attractive frock could have been created for a debutante than this chef-d'oeuvre. It is endowed with a demure atmosphere, and is carried out in black taffetas embroidered with pink flowers smarting sensation. Guard your eyesight, Estelle, as one of your most precious possessions.

GERTRUDE.—There is no use in pretending that we do not care about looking our best. Of course, we do—and this will be a dull old world when women no longer care whether they are prettily gowned and coiffed. So your hair has been bobbed and now you do not like it. Well I shall not be so unkind as to say "I told you so," but merely advise the use of a net until the hair is long enough to roll. The "bobbing" no doubt has its advantages, and it is easy to have it done when the fashion is seen on all sides; but the mature woman soon wearies of the style.

Pamela Pounce

Kitty Kilcroney put down her book. Seeing that her maid's eyes were genuinely tear-stained, and that the convulsive shiverings were not all assumed, she began to feel concern.

"Dear me!" she said again, in quite another tone. "I trust nothing has happened to your family—your good brother, or any of the children?"

She broke off. Lydia, who was making the most dreadful grimaces, here flung her little muslin apron over her head and sobbed behind it.

"It'll break my brother's heart, him so respected on his own property, as old in the name as gentry, yeomen these hundreds of years, and only for bad times none of them ever looking to service. And ho! my Lady, him setting such store by that girl, and me so proud of her!"

"That girl! You don't mean Pamela?"

Lydia dropped the apron.

"I do. The horrid, wicked creature. And ho, my Lady, it all comes of encouraging idle young gentlemen and paying their debts for them, and letting them off going to India, and if the name of Pounce is blasted, the name of Bellairs ain't much better, and so I tell you, fair and square, my Lady!"

"Good heavens!" said my Lady Kilcroney, whisking round so sharply on the sofa that Clarissa fell in one direction, and my Lady's cushions, fan, and pocket handkerchief in the other. "Never tell me that that silly young man is—has been—can be—"

"He was, he is, and as to can be, your Ladyship knows yourself what young gentlemen are! Oh, to think of its going on so long, though indeed, I might have known! Haven't I seen them walking together on a Sunday afternoon, times and again, and it's all head toss and 'How dare you, aunt?' if so much as a word of warning is given!"

"Jocelyn Bellairs! But what has been discovered? What proof have you?"

"Oh, la!" The fire of excitement was drying up the elder Miss Pounce's tears.

"Tis all over Mirabel's already. Proof, my Lady? Wasn't the unfortunate girl seen sitting in a garden last Sunday in a secret cottage, with a dark baby on her lap? A dark baby, my Lady! And think of Mr. Bellairs, as black as my shoe! And her, as Miss Smithson—that's the book-keeper, my Lady—who has just left me, said to me, as bold as brass, all in the sunshine. And she ain't denied nothing, neither."

"Who? Pamela?"

Kitty was falling from amazement to amazement. She had seen a vast deal, one way and another, of Madame Mirabel's milliner, and if ever there was, in her opinion, an honest, sensible, good-living young woman, it was Pamela Pounce.

"She don't deny it. Miss Popple up and taxed her straight out, and she as good as admitted it. Not a bit ashamed, either."

"Foh!" my Lady fumed. "Surely you're not going to condemn your own flesh and blood on hearsay, woman?"

"My Lady," Lydia began to pant, as if she suddenly remembered how hard she had been running. "I'm back from Madame Mirabel's this moment, and seen Pamela, and oh, the audacity of her! Laughing in my face, and tossing her head! And 'tis true," cries she, 'the little rogue is dark. And if I prefer 'em dark,' says she, 'what then?'"

"Ho, Miss," says I 'your taste lies in the dark line,' says I. 'That's no surprise to me you bold hussy!' And then, my Lady, you'll never believe it, she regular insulted me."

"Well," she says, 'and if I do prefer a dark gentleman, ain't a body free to have their fancy? There's you,' she says, 'as likes them fat and cat-footed, with a wheeze and a paunch,' referring, my Lady, to the attentions Mr. Blandfoot is paying me. And then I answers her back:—"

"I'm sure, you wicked girl, if Mr. Blandfoot and I ever agree to settle, it'll be as man and wife, respectable and respected."

"Why, lud, aunt," she says, 'you have a nasty mind.' And more than that, my Lady, I couldn't get out of her, it being her busy time. And—oh, dear, to be sure!—was there ever such a desperate bit of work? Her getting on so well, fought over by the ladies, I may say!"

Lady Kilcroney allowed the lamentations to continue without interruption for some time, her own thoughts being concentrated on the painful problem. The more she reflected upon it, the more, alas! she began to believe in the story.

Old Bellairs's nephew was a sad dog—a handsome, plausible, dashing, insidious rascal—she knew that. And that he had pursued Pamela with his attentions, she was also aware. The girl's attitude of defiance could hardly go with innocence and there was that strange story about the debt. Now, Kitty liked Pamela, and she had a certain sympathy, too, with a spirit that refused to humiliate itself on a question of private conduct.

"I trust no one has ever been able to say of me that I am otherwise than strictly virtuous," she thought, "but I can't abide these prying prudes that think 'tis their business to show up any poor child that's made a slip in her time."

"And, ho, my Lady," concluded Lydia, "they've kept it from Madame Mirabel, on condition that my niece resigns her situation."

"Now, look here, Lydia, stop sniffing. If 'tis my poor dear Bellairs's nephew that wronged the girl, I'll see that he makes reparation. He shall marry her. Leave it to me. Leave it to me, I say! I'll have the truth out of them both, and then I'll join their hands, I swear it, before I'm two days older!"

Kitty was one of those whose plans are swiftly conceived and whose impatient spirit will not brook an instant's delay in their execution. She sat down that very moment to write to her graceless relative.

"He must not guess," she thought, as her quill ran with little squeaks and pauses—"he must not guess that he is to be brought to book, or my young gentleman will have a thousand good reasons for declining to present himself."

"Dear Nephew Jocelyn," wrote she, very silkily—"Pray come and visit me this next Thursday afternoon at three of the clock. It is a long time since we have met, and there is a little matter—"

Here Kitty stopped and nibbled at her pen. How could she bait the trap so that the fox should fall into it?

"A little matter which I wish to discuss with you. I think when you hear what it is you will agree 'twas worth wasting half an hour on your attached aunt-in-law,"

"KITTY KILCRONEY."

Kitty shook the pounce-box over the sheet, folded, superscribed, and affixed with a pat a knowing little wafer which bore the semblance of a rose with the touching motto: "Sweet unto death."

Then, popping her round chin on her clasped hands, she gave herself to reflection, quite a minute's reflection.

"If you want a thing well done, do it yourself. There never was a sounder saw. I'll not trust Lydia."

My Lady took up her pen again. "My good Pounce"—thus ran the quill—"Pray present yourself here on Thursday at three o'clock, bringing the dark baby about which there's such a to-do. I think I have proved myself a friend to you; do you prove that you recognise it by falling in with my desire."

"K. KILCRONEY."

"P.S.—I was never more anxious to act well by you than in this instance."

Having despatched these missives, my Lady kept her counsel and when the answers came—Mr. Bellairs's reply accepting rather effusively, with indeed, as his benefactress felt, not without some malice, a lively sense of favours to come; and Pamela's in four respectful lines couched in the best millinery phraseology—the plotter looked them into her bureau, and forbade Lydia to mention the subject to her again, if she valued her situation.

Pamela Pounce

On the Thursday afternoon fixed for the meeting my Lady Kilcrouney thoroughly prepared to enjoy herself. There was nothing she more relished than the ruling of a difficult situation. She had no qualms as to the extent of her genius; she had no inconvenient scruples as to her wisdom.

The nephew of her late poor Bellairs had, it seemed, wronged the young person in whom she took an interest. He should be made to right that wrong, or her name was not Kitty Kilcrouney.

When the hour approached she clothed herself in garments subtly adapted to her role, rich in texture, yet grave in hue; a mulberry satin, to be precise, brocaded with amber roses. Her toilet accomplished, she flung a satisfied look into her mirror. 'Twas a bit heavy for a summer's day, but really, with the old deep-hued lace at throat and elbows, mightily becoming.

Then she wheeled upon her maid.

"Now, Lydia," ordered she, "you are not to show your nose till I bid you. I'll not have you poking it into my arrangements. It's a deal too sharp and fond of prying, as it is. Ay, I do expect your niece and Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs. And, no, I haven't told you anything about it. I'm to manage this business or I wash my hands of it. If you goggle your eyes any more, Lydia, they will drop out! Nay, I will not permit you a word with Pamela. Nay, not so much as a look at her. You will keep to your premises till I ring my bell."

Lydia tossed her head a good deal, and was sure she was very grateful to her Ladyship. And no one could accuse her of wanting to interfere, Heaven knew! And, as for looking at that creature's bold face again till she was an honest woman, it was enough for her the last time. Heaven was her witness that she'd had a queasiness at the pit of the stomach ever since!

Having issued her instructions, Kitty sailed downstairs, turned the astonished Kilcrouney out of his library, which had, she considered, a more judicious appearance than the gold-and-white drawing-room, ordered my Lord, in the determined tone which he never resisted, to his club till dinner-time; rang for a couple of footmen to remove my Lord's tankard, pipe and other witnesses of loose living from the premises, and sat herself down in a large leather arm-chair to await the sinners.

Three had not yet struck from the grandfather clock in the corner when Mr. Jocelyn Bellairs was announced. He entered with rather less of the conquering air than was his wont. No doubt a very handsome youth, and vastly improved in manners, thought Kitty, noting the exact depth of his bow and the decorous air of homage with which he kissed her extended hand. Attired, too, with a quiet elegance, which, considering that the hand he saluted was the one which had frequently paid his tailor, was, my Lady considered, well chosen.

"Pray sit down, Nephew Jocelyn. I am glad to see you."

When she had resumed her position in the seat of justice, and he had deferentially placed himself in a high-backed chair—a little too near her, she thought, for proper respect, but some slight familiarity might be pardoned to a relative—he looked at her interrogatively, and there ensued a silence.

It was not Kitty's policy to put him at his ease by small talk; rather, indeed, through a certain measured severity, to awaken stirs of conscience. And as now his fine brown orbs took the inward roll which she knew betokened self-searching, she kept an immovable countenance, looking down at her brocade lap and smoothing a fold here and there with delicate, be-ringed fingers. She had considerable knowledge of the world, this spoilt, pretty child of fortune!

"I'll wager," thought she, "he's counting up his debts, and wondering which I've heard of, and never giving a thought to his horrid immorality."

Christmas Macaroons

usually one pint of boiling water stirring constantly. Stir until sauce bubbles, let boil two minutes, add one-eighth teaspoon grated nutmeg and serve hot.

When Christmas cakes are mentioned the fruit cake comes to one's mind first of all. While there may not be the demand, which once existed, for the rich cake black with spices and heavy with fruits, it too, is a tradition and most of us like to make at least one of these cakes once a year. The baking of the fruit cake is always the difficult part of its making for it is not easy to keep the oven heat sufficiently low to give the cake its required number of hours in it. A cake baked in a fireless cooker usually attains the same quality and texture as the cakes baked in the old time brick ovens. Steaming the cake for three hours and then baking for one hour at a temperature of 300° gives satisfactory results also. The following is a tested recipe for a rich fruit cake:

Christmas Cake:—Wash and dry thoroughly one-half pound currants, seed and cut into small pieces two and one-half pounds raisins, slice very thin and cut into strips one-half pound of citron and one-half pound candied peel, chop finely one pound of figs and one-pound almonds. Add to the prepared fruit two table-six eggs. Stir in the fruits and nuts and add one cup shredded coconut. Beat the mixture well and add one-half teaspoon each of almond and vanilla extract. Bake in a well greased and floured loaf pan for one and one-half hours in a slow oven.

With a simple, satisfactory cake recipe, easy to make and pleasant to taste, a set of individual cake tins and cookie cutters of various shapes and sizes, it is possible to make small Christmas cakes quite as attractive as those seen in the confectioner's window. The following recipe baked in a shallow pan eight by twelve inches will cut into twelve individual cakes, or if you prefer, it may be baked in individual tins.

Plain Cake:—One-third cup butter, one and one-half cups flour, three-quarter cups sugar, two teaspoons baking powder, two eggs, one-quarter teaspoon salt, one-half cup milk, one-half teaspoon vanilla. Cream the butter and add the sugar gradually. Add the slightly beaten egg yolks. Sift the dry ingredients and add alternately with the milk then fold in the stiffly beaten egg whites. Bake in a shallow greased pan for twenty minutes in a moderate oven. The pan should be of such a size that the cake when baked tubes, one may make bands, ribbons, leaves, flowers, rosettes and all sorts of designs on the cakes. The person who is clever with a sketch pencil may with a toothpick and melted chocolate create any design her fancy chooses. Then there are the little accessories which make these festive goodies so attractive. Cut cherries, blanched almonds, angelica, pistachio nuts, grated cocoanut, candied winter green leaves, and berries, cut citron and fruit peel, may be used to form any number of designs.

An ornamental icing to use with a pastry tube may be made in the following manner. Beat the whites of two eggs until stiff but not dry. Add very gradually one and one-half cups pulverized sugar, a speck of cream of tartar and a teaspoon of lemon juice. Continue beating until mixture is stiff enough to be cut with a knife and retain its shape.

Butter Icing:—Cream one-half cup of butter very soft and gradually beat into it, two cups of pulverized sugar and flavor to taste. Orange juice or strong coffee make very satisfactory flavorings. This icing may also be used with the pastry tube.

Pamela Pounce

Mr. Bellairs cleared his throat, glanced uneasily at his hostess, began a sentence on the subject of the weather, broke off in the middle and said, with a plunge:

"Here I am, then, Aunt Kilcroney, agreeable to your command!"

"And, indeed, 'tis no less than your duty, I should think. 'Tis a vast of time, sir, since you have done me the honour to call upon me. Yet I think each quarter day brings you the wherewithal to remember me by, to say the least of it."

He looked at her with an expression in which relief and disappointment struggled. Was it only to keep him to heel, like a well-trained dog, that she had sent for him? Was there nothing but huffiness at his lack of assiduity to account for her air of disapproval, or had she heard of that little bill to which my Lord Kilcroney had so good-naturedly set his name? Or of that ruffling night at the Cocoa Tree when he had lost four hundred pounds to my Lord Sanquhar, and thereafter raised the money to settle it with Mr. Aaron, on my lady's own banker's order to himself? A transaction which might have been ruin indeed if the most generous girl in all the world had not got him out of the sponging house in time. Here his cogitations came to an abrupt end, and the very person in his thoughts stood in the doorway.

He got up, all amazement, as my lady too, majestically rose. What in the name of Heaven brought Pamela Pounce hither, and why, by all that was crazy, was she carrying a little dark child in her arms?

The young man flushed, bit his lip, and trembled with a sudden fury. By Heaven, if Pamela had gone behind his back to tattle to my Lady, he would—yes, dash it, he would pay her back and never speak to the chit again!

"Is this the child?" said Kitty, with a bell-like tone of melancholy.

Pamela curtsied with great deliberation for a reply, and, at a wave of Kitty's hand, gracefully sat down, settling her pretty burthen in her lap.

It was a little girl, beautiful in a dark way, with devouring brown eyes. She was exquisitely dressed in a lawn frock, with insertion and mignonette trimming. The Princess Amelia could not have been finer clad, thought Kitty, and as Pamela took off the straw hat with the ostrich feathers and revealed an ordered tangle of copper curls, which would one day be night-black, threaded through with a faint blue ribbon, my lady could hardly restrain a cry of admiration.

Kitty stood and looked at Mr. Bellairs. He was in the throes of undeniable agitation. She looked at Pamela, serene and, as she gazed down at the child, Kitty thought, lovely, with a maternal softening of her bright, handsome face.

"Ah, Jocelyn Bellairs!" cried Lady Kilcroney dramatically, "you may well turn away. You may well feel that sight were more than you can endure. But raise your eyes, sir. Behold, behold, and let your heart speak. Can you call yourself a man and refuse that trusting creature her rights, refuse that exquisite cherub a father's name?"

"Good Lord!" cried Jocelyn. He cast the hat he had been clasping under his arm into the middle of the room, the better to clutch his temples. "Am I stark, staring mad? What monstrous stroke is this, what plot, what inconceivable mistake?"

There was such a ring of truth in his accents that my Lady shot a doubting glance at Pamela, but conviction returned upon her as she saw this young woman bending over the child so as to hide her face, and shaken with hysterical emotion.

Kitty drew a long breath, and started again.

"Do not think, nephew, that by adding deceit to your villainess, you can make a better situation for yourself. Far from it. I have not sent for you here to-day to rebuke or even to reproach. My sole desire is to help you both. Heaven forbid that I should be hard on any woman who has been betrayed by her own heart!"

Pamela Pounce

"Pamela, if you had confided in me ere this—nay, never mind now! Suffice it that I know all. As for you, sir, I am well aware that gentlemen think all too lightly of a woman's virtue; that if their fancy leads them to court in a lower class than their own, the most hitherto virtuous and confiding female becomes, to use their own horrid words, fair game.

"But I'll not have Pamela Pounce treated so! She's far too good for you, sir, and so I tell you straight. And the proposal which I am about to make to you is for her sake, and not for yours. You shall marry this good young woman—good but for you, you scamp!—and I shall make it my business to place you in an advantageous position out of England. I'll pay your debts again, sir, and set you up. I have not thought where yet, but it shall not be India, for the little angel's sake—"

Here she stopped suddenly. Her eye strayed to the child, and she saw, to her utter amazement, that the young milliner was laughing, not weeping.

"Pamela Pounce!" she cried, in a scandalized voice.

Pamela got up and set the child on the floor.

"Will your Ladyship observe the little one? She is small for her age, I know, nevertheless it is plain to see she is over two years. How old are you, Carmelita? Tell the lady."

The child, who had maintained a solemn observant silence during the whole proceeding, her great eyes roaming from one person to another, while she contentedly sat on Pamela's lap, now looked up into her friend's face with a roguish smile.

"Tell the pretty lady."

"Tell you," said the child.

"Well, then, tell Pamela."

But with the perversity of its sex and years, the child was here seized with overwhelming giggles and buried its head in Pamela's skirt.

Kitty was staring with her mouth and eyes open, while a dawning sense of something utterly ludicrous and amazing showed itself on her face.

"If her Ladyship will kindly tax her memory," Pamela spoke in ineradicable bonnet-shop phraseology—"to the extent of recollecting that I met Mr. Bellairs for the first time on the door step of this house but eighteen months ago, she will realise that—"

"Enough! Enough!" cried Kitty.

She waved her hand, fell back into her arm-chair, pressing her filmy handkerchief to her lips, trying to check her peals of laughter. Perhaps she was not quite so overwhelmed with merriment as she pretended. Perhaps she felt that the only way of mitigating the supreme ridicule of her situation was by being the first to laugh at it.

As her patroness laughed, Pamela waxed serious, while Jocelyn Bellairs stood scarlet and indignant, the picture of offence and injured rectitude.

"I little thought, my Lady, when those cats at Mirabel's got hold of my cat of an aunt—begging your Ladyship's pardon—and started this scandal against me, and all along of seeing my pink flounce at tea with old Madame Gutierrez, this darling's grandmother, I little thought your Ladyship would be ready to believe such an outrageous bit of spiteful nonsense.

"When they upped, and attacked me, says I to them, 'Mind your own business!' Heaven be good to me," said Pamela. "I wasn't going to stoop to defend myself to them, and if I hadn't been the best-natured girl in the world, I'd have gone straight to Madame Mirabel, and told her then and there of their plot!

"And as for Aunt Lydia—well, her ladyship knows herself. Those old maids have the minds of I don't know what. It's enough to be young and good-looking for them to think the worst of you. And her a-drawing in Mr. Bellairs so shameful. I don't mind confessing to you, my Lady, that the more that poor old thing shook and shivered, and went on at me, the more I thought it would be a fine joke to let her give herself away. But when it comes to your Ladyship—"

"Well, well," said Kitty, not quite liking the tirade, with pansy eyes rather angry over tightly smiling lips. "You had but to write me three words of explanation, Pamela—"

"Begging your Ladyship's pardon, if I'd explained ever so, your Ladyship wouldn't have believed. No lady would ever believe a poor girl accused like me, if she didn't bring up proof. And allow me to point out, your Ladyship," went on the milliner, with a flourish, as if she were indicating some remarkable feather or trimming, "that your Ladyship having merely wrote me to come round with the child, it wouldn't have been becoming in me to be attributing meanings to your Ladyship's commands."

The fire went out of Kitty's eyes, for she was a just woman; she laughed again, and this time with a genuine ring.

"Why, was there ever such a girl! And I so moved over your story, and so yearning over the child, and so stirred up, ready to threaten and appeal. And so pleased with myself to be standing such a friend to you, and bringing Master Jocelyn to book so clever!"

"Nay," said Pamela, "she's not mine at all." Here she swung the little creature up into her arms, and hugged her. "And I'm sure I wish she was. There, I don't know what I wouldn't have gone through to have such a little darling as this all my own! No, she's not mine, your Ladyship. Poor innocent. Ah, 'tis cruel! It's worse than no mother at all she has, her that's the child of the wretch that calls herself Lady Sanquhar."

Both Kitty and her nephew-by-law cried out at this; Master Jocelyn was shaken from his injured mood by sudden memories.

Christmas Dinners of Long Ago

The Peacock and the Boar's Head were ably flanked by many geese capons and pheasants, drenched in amber-grease, and toothsome pies of carps-tongues,—for these were the days of rousing appetites, you must remember! And yet, withal, the feast could never have been complete if the indispensable "Furmenty" had been forgotten. And this is the way they made that delicacy—"Take clean wheat and bray it in a mortar, that the hulls be all gone off; and seethe it till it burst, and take it up, and let it cool; and take clean fresh broth, and sweet milk of almonds, or sweet milk of kine, and temper it all; and take the yolks of eggs. Boil it a little and set it down, and mess it forth with fat venison or fresh mutton."

Our modern mince-pies appeared on the laden board also in those days, but they were called "mutton-pies." "Shred or Christmas Pies," and in earlier days neats-tongue was used in place of mutton in their making. Plum pudding was there also, brownish mellow and delicious, though half-drowned in its sauce of rarely blended wines, but plum pottage, a prime favorite in those days, has ceased to be found on Christmas menus now. In olden days it was always served with the first course of a Christmas dinner. It was made by boiling beef or mutton with broth thickened with brown bread. When half-boiled, raisins, currants, prunes, cloves, mace and ginger were added, and when the whole was thoroughly boiled, it was sent to the table with the best of meats.

Ah, well! Those good old days are gone, and we do not do things in just the same ways now, but still we like to think, at Christmas time, that hearty hospitality remains the same, in spirit at least, and that for all, "Hope shall brighten days to come, And Memory gild the past."

The Queen Dish

To the finest breakfast you can serve it adds the supreme delight

Do you realize how much Puffed Grains have added to breakfast delights?

Consider Puffed Rice—toasted grain bubbles, as flimsy as snowflakes, as savory as nuts.

Consider Puffed Wheat—the world's supreme grain—made a tempting food confection.

Not made for tidbits

Yet Puffed Grains were not made to be enticing. A great food expert—Prof. A. P. Anderson—invented them. And his object was to make the whole grains wholly digestible.

The grains are sealed in guns, then rolled for an hour in fearful heat. The bit of moisture in each food cell is changed to steam. When the guns are shot, over 125 million steam explosions occur in every kernel. Every food cell is thus blasted, so digestion is made easy and complete.

Now you have whole grains so prepared that every atom feeds. All the 16 elements in a grain of wheat supply their needed nutriment.

And those whole grains are made fascinating, so children revel in them.

Do you serve these ideal grain foods as often as you should?

The Plant Lore of the Christ Child

BY LYDIA O'SHEA

OF THE MANY LEGENDS which time and fancy have combined to weave, there are probably none more beautiful than those associated with the flowers of Christmastide, namely, the Christmas rose, the Glastonbury thorn, and the sainfoin.

The following old French story accounts for the origin of the Christmas rose:

At the time of the Saviour's birth, when the shepherds were hastening to Bethlehem and the Wise Men journeying with their costly offerings, one poor little peasant maid, Madelon, was sad at heart indeed, because she had no means of procuring even the tiniest gift for the infant King.

But her grief was felt in the Courts of Heaven, and the Angel Gabriel sent to comfort her. With tender words he took her by the hand, and, leading her out of the city, showed her a miracle which God had wrought to provide her with an exquisite offering. For as they gazed upon the snow-clad earth, lo! a tiny leaf and a little bud of green pushed their way through its wintry robe, and as Madelon watched, the sepals uncurred and revealed a lovely rose of milk-white sheen. Then as the flowers sprang up all around her, the little maid gathered great handfuls, while her heart sang for joy at the beauty of the gift thus divinely found. And lo! the pure blossom that grew that day,

On a field clad in virgin snow,
Is the sweet Christmas rose which the Father made,
For the Babe in His cradle low.

Botanically, the Christmas rose is known as the black hellebore, and was much used by the ancients to purify their houses and sanctify their temples. They also believed that if a house were strewn with their blossoms their faint perfume would drive away evil spirits, and if laid upon the cattle would render them secure against all spell and witchcraft.

In the old monks' "Calendar of Flowers" we find the Christmas rose allotted to St. Agnes, a most appropriate choice, since its delicate white blossoms were aptly suited to the patroness of purity.

In some parts of the country the Christmas rose, "Cradled in snow and fanned by arctic air," is still called the winter rose, and prior to the Reformation was widely known as the flower of St. Agnes. In Germany it is referred to as "Christwurz."

The story of the Glastonbury thorn is better known. This is a species of hawthorn, reputed to blossom every Christmas Day, or, more precisely, to put forth its blossoms at midnight on Christmas Eve. Tradition says that in his journey over the land the good Joseph of Arimathea came at length to Glastonbury to preach to the inhabitants the good tidings of the Gospel, but, being aged and sore fatigued with his climb up the "Weary-all-Hill," sat down to rest, but no sooner had he planted his hawthorn staff in the ground than it at once took root and flourished apace, growing into a sturdy tree, bearing leaves and flowers even in the depth of winter.

As the years passed the original thorn died, but wise folk had taken cuttings, and these descendants still thrive up and down the land.

The legend of the rose-coloured sainfoin (holy hay) also comes from France, and relates how when Jesus was lying in the manger at Bethlehem some sainfoin chanced to be among the dried grass and herb which served for His bed, and directly the Christ Child was laid thereon the plant put forth its lovely red blossoms to form a wreath or crown round the Saviour's head.

The old superstition is referred to in the following lines by Alfred Lear Huxtable:

What have the pilgrims told
About this flower?
Said they, when in times of old,
The Infant in the manger lay,
Thou thy blossoms didst display,
And changed His humble birthplace to a bower.

a patch of scarlet on his head, which is partly concealed by the dark feathers surrounding it.

Although I do not see them nearly as often, I number among my bird friends the Red Heads among the ducks. Some of these have brownish-red heads, others reddish-brown heads, while several more have just plain red ones. Among the red-browns is that beautiful bird, the Green-Winged Teal.

There are also the Redhead and the Canvasback, both large birds with dark-brown caps as fine, and complete as Reddy Tip-Tap's.

A stranger to most of you, but one occasionally seen in this country, is the Buzzard, the only ugly Red-Head of all. His head is red, all right, but he hasn't a single feather on it.

Many of our smaller birds have touches of rich brown, so bright and vivid that, if you include them, you can make the list twice as long as I have done.

It is a good idea to classify the birds you know under some such unusual classification, for it quickens your observation, and helps your memory, besides giving an added interest in your feathered friends.

The Echo

yours, what I can give you of myself and my money."

The boy was standing now, looking down with the adoration he could not hide, at the man stretched full length in his big chair. He raised his hand when Rob tried to speak.

"No! no thanks, but this—"

Their hands clasped, there was undying understanding between them.

Together they went to the window, as the clock on the mantel piece struck twelve.

"She always liked the stars to shine on Christmas Eve. How bright they are to-night," Rob said.

"Yes I remember," the man answered, then with a smile: "A Happy Christmas Rob."

Rob turned his face away, his answer was very low.

Later John lay on his cot listening. Far off the midnight express whistled, drew near, then gradually died away, until mellowed by distance was lost. He could hear it now without the hurting pain. As an echo from the past Rob had come to beckon him forward into the future.

On the other cot the boy lay wide awake, "Gee," he thought, "Gee, he must have known who I was all the time. He's great, he's the greatest ever."
